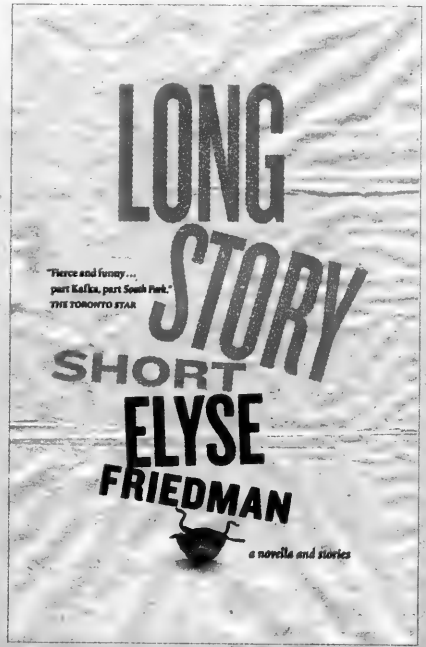
Most recently, the Toronto native's screen-play, Birds of America, became a major motion picture. Starring actors Matthew Perry and Hilary Swank, the movie was shown at the Sundance Film Festival in January. Yet Friedman comes across as unaffected.

"It's not going to change my life. I don't think it's going to make any difference in my life," she said.

"Once the script is paid for, your vision doesn't matter and what you see on the screen doesn't have any bearing on what you've written."

Friedman isn't bitter or anti-Hollywood; she's realistic and acknowledges the differences between the film industry and the publishing world.



Throughout her 44 years, she's published two novels, one book of short stories, a compilation of poems and has written several screenplays.

She's won the Gold National Magazine Award for fiction, and her works have appeared in McClelland's Journey Prize Stories and Best Canadian Stories, in addition to literary journals and anthologies across Canada and the United States.

Friedman attended film school, but writing, for both film and print, determined her career path.

"When I got out of film school [at Sheridan College], I planned to be a writer-director, but there was no real film industry at the time, and there were no jobs available. I didn't know where to get a film made," she said.

"I went into another line of work for 10 years, and by the time I was done, it was easier to be a writer than a filmmaker. [It's] because you just do it on your own – you don't rely on anyone else."

One of Friedman's successful screenplays was 2001's Suddenly Naked, a comedy about a famous novelist on the verge of 40 struggling with writer's block until she meets and falls in love with a talented writer half her age.

Shot over 23 days on a low budget, Suddenly Naked was projected onto the film festival screens of Berlin, Toronto, Vancouver and Maui, Hawaii.

Furthermore, it earned six Genie Award nominations and won the award for best editing.

When she was 18, having graduated from college, Friedman worked at corporate jobs before moving to Winnipeg for a stint as a comedy writer for the CBC radio shows Brand X and Definitely Not the Opera.

In 1998, she set her sights on penning her first novel, the 1999 Trillium Award nominee Then Again, a witty, dark comedy that chronicles the history of the Schafer family's three children, Michelle, Maria and their delinquent brother, Joel.

The book's eerie beginnings kick off when Michelle receives an invitation to a "Blast from the Past" party to be held in her childhood suburban home.

Knowing the warped ways of her twisted, millionaire screenwriter brother, she pinpoints Joel as the mastermind behind the gathering.

Along with her sister Maria, the two girls arrive at their old home, only to discover it has been restored to resembled its 1970s décor, and that Joel has hired two actors to play the roles of their deceased parents.

"If I had to sum up [my characters] in one word, I'd say 'outsiders,'" Friedman said. "There's not one particular source from where I get my inspiration. It comes from different places. I get it from life, and ideas pop into my head. I file them away and sooner or later it's time to deal with them, whether in a screenplay, book or poem or whatever it happens to be."

Friedman's witty collection of short stories, Long Story Short, documents the lives of six perverse and eccentric protagonists who share one common characteristic: living lives that have somehow gone off kilter.

In Wonderful, a suicidal man meets an angel who shows him how much happier the people in his life would be if he didn't exist, while The Soother profiles a hard-working family man who wants to be cared for in the same way as an infant: nursed by a mother, petted and cooed at, and diapered. And he gets it for $200 an hour.

Elyse Friedman

Friedman appears to purposely misplace her characters into lives they were never meant to lead, forcing them to face challenges they have difficulty overcoming, or do not want to overcome at all.

Right through her accomplished career in the film and print industries, Friedman has explored a variety of writing styles and themes in her works.

"With a novel, you have more control over your work. They're great because you can take the time to digress, which you can't do in other forms, and you can wander around a bit because you've got a longer stretch of time," she explained.

"The short story is nice because it's not a big commitment of time, so you can take chances with ideas and be a little [more] free than if you were writing a novel, which you have to make sure is the right idea because you spend a year on it. Poems are pure, a very distilled way of writing."

Friedman's upcoming projects include a new novel and several screen plays.

For now, she's busy working on a project that raises her enthusiasm: her four-year-old son, Max.

"He seems to be [a bit like me]," she revelled. "He's brilliant, very smart and very funny."

Cooking contest winner brings back childhood memories

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

My Grandma Ruchel was very religious. When I was a child, I would watch her pray facing the cabinet where she kept the Tam Tams – those addictive, "bet you can't eat one" crackers from Manischewitz – swaying back and forth as her arthritic fingers turned the pages of her prayer book. I had no idea she was facing east. I thought Tam Tam crackers were holy!

So it was with amusement and instant recognition that I read that Joy Devor, grand prize winner of the Second Annual Simply Manischewitz Cook-Off, used Tam Tams, her favourite cracker, for her winning recipe.

"I have been eating Manischewitz Tam Tams my whole life, and that's why it's so meaningful to me that they are the key ingredient in my winning recipe," Devor said. "Somehow I feel that my memories will be passed on through my dish."

Devor, who now lives in Far Rockaway, N.Y., (coincidentally where I went to high school), grew up in Los Angeles in an Orthodox Jewish home. "That section of L.A. is a beautiful Jewish community that has become a lot more religious now," she said. "When I was growing up, there was one kosher pizza shop and one burger place. You go up and down Pico today, and the variety of kosher restaurants is amazing."

Her mom worked full time, was president of her synagogue's sisterhood and was involved in study groups and bridge clubs.

"I didn't realize back then that my mom was a gourmet cook. I thought it was normal," she recalled. "I would go to my friend's house every week, and they'd have gefilte fish and matzah ball soup, and my mom was cooking beef stroganoff. She even made her own egg rolls and wontons."

Devor experienced her cooking revelation at 14, when her mom was asked to edit the local synagogue cookbook. "That's when I ended up right next to her in the kitchen. The two of us tested the recipes. We had tons of fun with it. I look at this cookbook today and realize that she was way ahead of her time."

A part-time teacher, Devor has six children, ranging in age from 19 to six, and she created her winning recipe years ago for them. "I wanted to figure out a new way to make fish that my kids would actually eat, because there's just so much gefilte fish that you can serve them," she explained.

As the grand prize-winner, Devor took home a state-of-the-art GE Profile Stainless Steel Kitchen, a $5,000 check, plus other goodies. "It was my dream to do a kitchen remodel," she said. "Now I've got a whole new kitchen – cooktop, double oven, big refrigerator, dishwasher, everything!"

As you might expect from Manischewitz, the contest was conducted under strict rabbinical supervision. "I've never entered a cooking contest before," Devor revealed, "and this was run very, very well. Some of the contestants didn't even know how to keep kosher. The rabbis turned on the stoves and checked the vegetables. The judges were served the dairy dishes first, then the pareve and then the meat."

All the equipment requested by the contestants was provided. "They were very accommodating," said Devor. "They gave you any special knives or whatever you needed. On the day of the semi-finals, one woman had brought her own potato masher. The rabbi said, 'Sorry, you can't use that,' and he ran out and bought her a new one."

Devor has had lots of support from her neighbours and friends. "All of Far Rockaway is totally into this," she said. "They feel like the whole town won this contest. When I meet people in the street they say, 'Go Far Rockaway!'"

She had little time to get nervous about the cook-off, however, which was held Feb. 27, just two days after her daughter's wedding, a catered affair for 500 people.

In her "spare" time, Devor tested recipes for cookbook author Jamie Geller, whose new cookbook, The Bride Who Knew Nothing, was recently released. "It's no secret that Jamie couldn't cook," she noted. "She had six weeks between Thanksgiving and New Year's to test 300 recipes. Some of them were only ideas of recipes. I did 10 a day and we got it done."

Devor said she would love to work on another book – she's had plenty of practice cooking for her family. "I'm a mommy, and cooking is how I've kept myself busy between babies," she said. "With six kids, I do nothing but cook!"

FANTASTIC FLOUNDER ROLLS

From Joy Devor, winner of the Second Annual Simply Manischewitz Cook-Off

2 lb. fresh flounder or sole fillets
1 container (10 oz.) fresh sliced button mushrooms
2 medium Spanish onions, chopped
2 to 3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 box Manischewitz everything Tam Tams
1/3 cup cornflake crumbs
1 to 2 bottles (8 oz. each) Thousand Island dressing salt
pepper
curly parsley, red pepper for garnish

Preheat oven to 350. Sauté onions in oil over medium heat until soft and translucent. Add mushrooms and continue to sauté until mushrooms are nicely browned and liquid is reduced. Season to taste with salt and pepper.

Crush Tam Tams lightly and add to mushroom onion mixture. Continue to crush mixture until mushrooms and Tam Tams are in very small pieces.

Spread Tam Tam mixture in centre of each fillet and roll like a jellyroll. Place in greased baking sheet seam side down. Liberally pour Thousand Island dressing over fish. Sprinkle with cornflake crumbs. Bake 20 to 25 minutes or until cooked through. Garnish with curly parsley and red pepper. Serve warm or cold. Serves 8.

Eat healthy, eat chocolate

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I was talking to a friend and joked that these days there are problems with meat because of mad cow disease, problems with chicken because of bird flu and problems with vegetables because of bug infestations. So the only healthy food left to us is chocolate!

Her response was, "You should write a column about that… and include some good chocolate recipes."

Now that we are being told by doctors that chocolate is healthy for us, we just have to remember moderation. I'm afraid however, that moderation will fly out the window when you are faced with these desserts.

CHOCOLATE LAVA CAKE

I have been making this cake for more than 30 years and it's an all-time favourite with anyone who has ever tasted it. It's simple to make and absolutely fabulous.

2 cups all-purpose flour
4 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1 1/2 cups sugar
1/3 cup cocoa
1 cup water
4 tbsp. margarine, melted
2 cups chopped nuts, optional
2 cups brown sugar
1/2 cup cocoa
3 1/2 cups boiling water

Preheat oven to 350. Sift flour, baking powder, salt, white sugar and 1/3 cup cocoa. Stir in water, margarine and nuts. Mixture will be stiff. Spread in a 9 x 13-inch baking dish.

Combine brown sugar and 1/2 cup cocoa. Sprinkle over batter. Place baking dish in oven on a sheet of aluminum foil or a cooking sheet in case of spillover. Pour boiling water over batter. Bake in preheated oven for 45 minutes. Bubbles will appear around edges. Top will be firm, but will float. Serve warm with a serving spoon and spoon sauce over cake. Makes 16 servings.

Popcorn, the original snack

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

As you settle down to watch the your favorite sports team on television, or a movie on your DVD, the most appropriate snack has to be a bowl of hot, fluffy popcorn.

Believe it or not, popcorn has been around for thousands of years. Popcorn cobs were found by archeologists in caves in New Mexico that proved to be several thousand years old, making it probably the original snack food.

Making popcorn from scratch is not difficult. You want as many kernels as possible to pop, but you also want to keep the kernels from burning at the bottom of the pan. The best method of making popcorn not only pops almost every kernel, it also prevents the kernels from burning. Some true popcorn lovers (like me!) keep a special pot that is used only for making popcorn. Here's how it goes:

3 tbsp. oil, preferably canola oil (high smoke point oil)
1/3 cup of high quality popcorn kernels
1 3-quart covered saucepan
2 tbsp. or more (to taste) of butter or margarine
salt to taste

Heat the oil in a 3-quart saucepan on medium high heat. Put 3 or 4 popcorn kernels into the oil and cover the pan. When the kernels pop, add the rest of the 1/3 cup of popcorn kernels in an even layer. Cover, remove from heat and count 30 seconds. (Count out loud; it's fun to do with kids.) This method first heats the oil to the right temperature, then waiting 30 seconds brings all of the other kernels to a near-popping temperature so that when they are put back on the heat, they all pop at about the same time.

Return the pan to the heat. The popcorn should begin popping soon, and all at once. Once the popping starts in earnest, gently shake the pan by moving it back and forth over the burner. Try to keep the lid slightly ajar to let the steam from the popcorn release (the popcorn will be drier and crisper). Once the popping slows to several seconds between pops, remove the pan from the heat, remove the lid, and dump the popcorn immediately into a wide bowl.

With this technique, nearly all of the kernels pop. I rarely have more than two or three unpopped kernels and nothing burns. If you are adding butter, you can easily melt it by placing the butter in the now empty, but hot pan. Salt to taste. Temperatures should be hot enough so the kernels pop within one to three minutes. For the best yield, all the kernels should burst within two minutes of the first pop. This makes about two quarts of popcorn.

Additional tips: If you add salt to the oil in the pan before popping, when the popcorn pops, the salt will be well distributed throughout the popcorn. You can also top your popcorn with smoky paprika, cayenne or chili pepper, curry powder, cumin or grated Parmesan or cheddar cheese, garlic powder or garlic salt.

Why not top your soup or salads with popped popcorn; season the popping oil with spices to create a lightly flavored savory treat; combine popcorn with dried fruit and nuts to create your own custom snack mix. Small bags of popcorn are also an excellent addition to school lunch bags.

The jars that hold popcorn these days are especially designed to help hold the moisture in the kernels. You've likely noticed that high quality popcorn is often tightly sealed or the kernels are enclosed in an airtight package. Once the package is open, popping corn is best stored in a sealed container so it loses as little moisture as possible. I like to store mine in the freezer. I find it pops into much larger kernels.

FRENCH CHOCOLATE MINT BISCOTTI

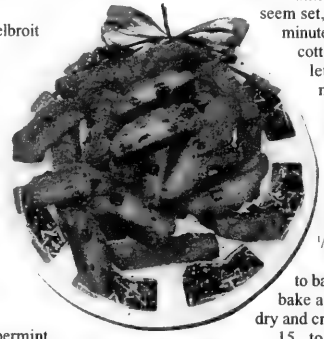
Your grandmother's mandelbroit was never like this!

1/4 cup unsalted butter, melted and still warm
1/2 cup cocoa powder, measured and then sifted
1 1/2 cups sugar
4 large eggs
2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
1 tbsp. double-strength brewed coffee or espresso
3 to 4 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup chocolate-covered peppermint patties, minced
1/2 cup semi-sweet chocolate, cut into coarse chunks

Finishing touches:
6 oz. white chocolate, melted
1/2 to 1 tsp. pure mint extract



Chocolate biscotti

Preheat oven to 350. Line two small baking sheets or one large baking sheet with parchment paper.

In a mixer bowl, stir together melted butter and cocoa. Blend in sugar and then add eggs, vanilla and coffee.

In a separate bowl, blend flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Stir into wet batter and then fold in minced peppermint patties and semi-sweet chocolate.

Form dough into two logs and place on prepared baking sheets. For larger biscotti, use one large sheet and make one large log of dough.

Bake until biscotti logs seem set, about 30 to 40 minutes. Remove biscotti from oven and let cool 15 to 20 minutes. Reduce oven temperature to 325. Using a long serrated knife, slice logs on the diagonal into slices about 1/2 inch thick.

Return biscotti to baking sheets and bake a second time to dry and crisp them, about 15 to 20 minutes, turning once midway to ensure even baking. Since cookies are dark, it is difficult to judge when they are done. They should seem almost dry to the touch when ready. Let cool completely on baking sheets.

For coating, melt white chocolate slowly and then briskly whisk in mint extract very quickly so as to blend and flavour white chocolate without chocolate seizing up. You can spread or drizzle melted white chocolate onto one side of these baked cookies for a gourmet look.

Sue's note: The second time I made this I added white chocolate chips to the batter before baking instead of coating them. Makes 24 to 36 depending on size.

IMPORTANT NOTICE / AVIS IMPORTANT

Government of Canada / Gouvernement du Canada

Reducing Canada's Immigration Backlog

The Government of Canada believes in immigration: we want more newcomers to join us, families to be re-unified faster and labour market demands to be met.

Currently, the immigration backlog sits at 925,000 applications. This means that the wait time for an application can be as long as six years.

That's why the Government of Canada is proposing measures to cut the wait.

These important measures, once in effect, include:

- More Resources: An additional $109 million to speed up the application process.
- Faster Processing Times: The ability to fast-track new applications.
- Better Employment Opportunities: Matching skills with our economic needs.
- Complete Processing: All applications currently in the backlog will be processed.

These measures are currently before Parliament.

All of these changes respect the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act.

Canada needs an immigration system that is flexible, fast and fair for everyone — that's why we're reducing the immigration backlog.

For more information on these changes please call 1 800 O-Canada (1-800-622-6232) TTY: 1-800-926-9105.

Réduire le nombre de demandes d'immigration en attente au Canada

Le gouvernement fonde beaucoup d'espoir sur l'immigration : nous souhaitons qu'un plus grand nombre de nouveaux arrivants choisissent de venir s'établir ici, que les familles soient réunies plus rapidement et que le marché du travail puisse compter sur les ressources dont il a besoin.

Actuellement, le nombre de demandes d'immigration en attente se chiffre à 925 000. Cela se traduit par des délais de traitement pouvant atteindre six ans.

- réduire les délais de traitement : la capacité d'accélérer le traitement des nouvelles demandes;
- améliorer les possibilités d'emploi : sélectionner des travailleurs qualifiés dont les compétences répondent à nos besoins économiques;
- traiter toutes les demandes : toutes les demandes déjà en attente seront traitées.

Le Canada a besoin d'un système d'immigration souple, rapide et équitable pour tous — c'est pour cette raison que nous réduisons le nombre de demandes d'immigration en attente.

Turkish mediation promotes Syrian-Israeli talks

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — While much remains to be done before any peace agreement could be reached between Israel and Syria, Turkey will continue to act as a go-between to encourage the two sides to restart direct negotiations, Turkish Foreign Minister Ali Babacan said Monday.

Babacan told reporters that an agreement between the longtime enemies requires strong political determination on both sides.

"We are still at the very beginning of the process," Babacan said in a news conference with New Zealand's foreign minister. His comments were in response to a question on Turkey's mediation efforts.

Turkey, which has close ties to both Israel and Syria, has disclosed that it is trying to restart low-level talks between the two countries as a prelude to bringing the leaders of Syria and Israel together.

The last round of direct peace talks between the two countries broke down in 2000 over the details of Israel's proposed withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

"Talks will continue to take place through Turkey for awhile," Babacan said. "When the issue is a little more mature, then I hope that the sides will meet each other.

"It is a very promising development," he added. "There has been diplomatic traffic for the past year, which has intensified in the past few months."

Meanwhile, a source in Jerusalem said Sunday that Turkey is trying to find a compromise that would allow peace talks between Israel and Syria to begin.

Recent proposals to begin negotiations between Syria and Israel stalled after Syrian President Bashar Assad demanded assurance from Israel that it will withdraw from the Golan Heights as a prerequisite for peace talks to begin.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Erdogan plans to send an emissary to Jerusalem to brief Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on his recent talks with Assad in Damascus. Erdogan will reportedly send his foreign policy advisor, who is also in charge of talks with Syria and has in the past met with Olmert adviser Yoram Turbowicz in Ankara.

Olmert decided to pursue talks with Syria using Turkish mediation after he realized that the United States would not object. If the mediation is successful, the talks between Syria and Israel could begin while President George W. Bush is still in the White House.

"The U.S. has never vetoed talks between Israel and Syria, which is why there is nothing to stop talks from going ahead during this U.S. administration, if the conditions are ripe," the government source said.

The source added that Israel has not yet received an update on Erdogan's talks in Damascus. "The goal of Turkey's activity is to allow talks to start. That's how we view it. So far, no real negotiations are taking place."

There are substantial disagreements in the two sides' opening positions, the source said. Olmert has called for direct and discreet talks to begin immediately, without arbiters or preconditions. Assad, however, has called for open talks, arbitrated by the United States. In addition, he wants Israel to announce that it would be willing to hand over the Golan Heights territory it seized in the Six Day War, in accordance with an alleged similar commitment agreed to by prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1995.

The Turks are taking both sides' stances into consideration and trying to come up with a formula that would bring them to the negotiating table, the government source said. "The key issue now is to find a solution that would satisfy Syria's demand that Israel commit to a withdrawal from the Golan Heights, which at the moment is impeding progress."

The source said Israel is considering an alternative, in the form of a public announcement indicating that Israel is "well aware of the price it would have to pay at the end of talks."

Israeli officials believe Turkey's involvement in the issue will increase. "Erdogan has decided to go all the way on the issue of Israel and Syrian," the Israeli governmental source said.

Syria denounces U.S. statement

A statement was issued last Thursday by the Syrian Embassy in Washington rejecting the Bush administration's claims: "The government of the Syrian Arab Republic regrets and denounces the campaign of false allegations that the current United States administration continually launches against Syria claiming the presence of nuclear activity," the statement said.

"And while Syria utterly denies these allegations, it also stresses that this campaign aims primarily to misguide the U.S. Congress and international public opinion in order to justify the Israeli raid in September of 2007, which the current U.S. administration may have helped execute. It has become obvious that this manoeuvre on the part of this administration comes within the framework of the North Korean nuclear negotiations."

Senior U.S. intelligence officials later told reporters the United States did not have advance knowledge of the strike.

The revelations came after months of behind the scenes wrangling between hawks in Congress and the Bush administration, who both want to further isolate Syria and North Korea, and Israeli officials, who want to keep peace-talk possibilities with Syria open and who bridle at revelations of Israeli military operations.

Elsewhere, citing South Korean intelligence officials, the Japanese public broadcaster NHK said on Monday that 10 North Koreans helping build the suspected nuclear reactor in Syria may have died in the Israeli air strike last September.

NHK said the dead included officials of North Korea's Communist party unit that exports weapons and military technology, as well as members of the North Korean military unit that made nuclear facilities in the country.

Two or three North Koreans survived the air strike, but it is not clear what happened to them afterward, NHK reported.

Pyongyang has been reluctant to discuss any transfer of nuclear technology to other countries, notably Syria, as well as to account for its suspected pursuit of uranium enrichment.

Jews leaving Bolivia as Morales favours socialism

By DANIEL BUSH
JTA

LA PAZ, Bolivia — More than any other single event in recent years, the future of Bolivian Jewry may be determined by the outcome of the country's upcoming national referendum on a new constitution.

The proposed constitution calling for increased state control of private-sector enterprise is being fiercely opposed by many middle- and upper-class Bolivians, including the country's Jews. Four of Bolivia's wealthiest provinces have launched autonomous movements in response to the proposal.

The referendum is scheduled for May 4.

Bolivia's Jewish community has shrunk considerably in the past decade. Young Jews are seeking larger Jewish communities, and both old and young have left to find professional opportunities unrestricted by the policies of Evo Morales, the socialist who became Bolivia's president in 2005.

Morales, Bolivia's first indigenous president, is staunchly anti-American and has endorsed Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's call for an anti-American "axis of good" comprising Bolivia, Venezuela and Cuba.

Ricardo Udler, the president of the Israeli Circle of La Paz, the country's main Jewish organization, says Bolivian Jews are increasingly uncomfortable about the direction the country of nine million is taking under Morales.

"Since Evo was elected there's been a radical change," Udler said.

Though there is no overt anti-Semitism in Bolivia, he said, Bolivia's approximately 350 Jews feel threatened by Morales' close ties with Chavez and his growing relationship with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Since Morales took office, the Jewish population of La Paz, Bolivia's capital and the home of its largest Jewish community, has fallen by some 10 per cent. That has a significant impact on a community of approximately 189.

Bolivia's Jews find themselves in a predicament not unlike Jews in South America's socialist leader, Venezuela, which has lost approximately half its Jews since Chavez took power. As in Venezuela, Jews in Bolivia fear increased state control of their businesses and lives.

Morales' increasingly close relationship with Iran hasn't helped. Last September, Ahmadinejad on a visit to Bolivia pledged to invest $5 billion in the country over the next five years, including in the natural gas and oil industries. Those industries already receive support from Chavez.

Bolivian President Evo Morales

The Morales administration also has announced the possibility of Iran opening an embassy in La Paz.

Due to these developments, said Bolivian Jewish businessman Joe Epelbaum, "a lot of Jews are planning to leave."

"This is a fast-shrinking community," he said.

The upturn in Jewish emigration from Bolivia represents a surprising reversal for a country that during World War II was among the few in South America that offered visas to Jews fleeing Europe. Jewish immigrants settled in La Paz as well as the cities of Cochabamba and Santa Cruz, establishing communities that thrived in the postwar years.

During the 1950s, La Paz had between 12,000 and 15,000 Jews, according to Udler.

Harald Schoengut, the president of the Israeli Association of Cochabamba, said his city's Jewish population reached 2,000 half a century ago. About 110 Jews now live there.

In La Paz, some two dozen Jews recently attended Shabbat services at the Israeli Circle of La Paz building on a Friday evening. At a dinner later that night attended by about the same number of people, the host noted with chagrin that one-10th of La Paz's once-booming Jewish community could fit under a single roof.

Most of those leaving the country are third-generation Bolivian Jews seeking better educational and professional opportunities in the United States, Israel and Europe.

"We're trying to avoid this by enticing the younger generations to study here in Cochabamba," Schoengut told JTA. Despite this effort, most young Jewish high school and university graduates continue to leave the country. "The future is very uncertain." he said.

Udler said a similar exodus is taking place among young Jews in La Paz.

"We have a big problem that our children go to study abroad and they don't come back," he said. "My sons, for example, won't come back to Bolivia," from Israel, where they have moved, "because there isn't a Jewish community here. In Bolivia, they don't have a Jewish future."

Since Morales came to power, older Jews also have been leaving in greater numbers than ever, according to Epelbaum, who owns a large textile factory here with two brothers-in-law.

"Families with bigger, more profitable businesses that are harder to leave behind are staying," said Epelbaum, 57, who was born in Poland and immigrated to Bolivia with his parents when he was seven. "But there's no future as a Jew in Bolivia even if you have a business that's doing well."

Jews in the country's textile industry have been hurt by Morales' unpredictable labour and trade policies, Epelbaum said. Morales has limited exporters' access to international markets and restricted foreign investment in Bolivia.

Epelbaum's textile store, on a busy commercial street in the centre of La Paz, is crowded with rolls of coloured fabrics. A photograph of Epelbaum's three daughters hangs on the wall behind the counter at the back of the store. All of them have left the country.

"I'm basically still here for economic reasons," he said. "Eventually, though, I don't see myself staying here."

The professionally and socially driven emigration of Bolivia's younger Jews coupled with the politically driven emigration of its more established members means the days of Bolivian Jewry are numbered, Udler said.

"In the next 10 to 20 years," he said, "there will be no more Jews in Bolivia."

What's behind U.S. spy arrest? Speculation abounds

Is it connected to the classified-information case against two former AIPAC staffers? Is it a bid to pressure Israel to concede more to the Palestinians ahead of a new round of peace talks? Is it connected to the murky circumstances of Israel's mysterious air strike in Syria last September?

For now, the main question surrounding the case of Ben-Ami Kadish, the octogenarian New Jersey man arrested last week for allegedly sharing classified information with Israel decades ago is: why now?

The four charges of conspiracy against Kadish are serious. He is accused of having shared with his Israeli handler U.S. nuclear secrets, plans for combat aircraft improvements and missile defense information.

From 1979 to 1985, Kadish allegedly "borrowed" 30 to 100 documents from the library of the U.S. Army facility in Dover, N.J., where he was employed and shared them with the science affairs consul at the Israeli consulate in New York, who has not been charged.

Kadish, a Connecticut native who grew up in pre-state Palestine, served in the Haganah, Israel's pre-state defence force. He also served in the U.S. military during World War II.

He allegedly told FBI agents that he shared the documents to help Israel. He was not paid by Israel for his services.

Some observers noted that the charges against him should be way past their due date: the statute of limitations on the charges is 10 years, unless they incur the death penalty. Prosecutors have yet to say whether or not they intend to pursue the death penalty against Kadish, who has not been indicted.

Some Jewish community leaders are asking whether his arrest is part of an attempt by federal agents to influence the outcome of the classified-information case against two former senior staffers for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman.

Analysis

Rosen and Weissman were indicted nearly three years ago for allegedly sharing classified information on Iran and terrorism with journalists, colleagues and Israeli diplomats. But the case against the pair has yet to come to trial, in large part because the judge has limited its scope to proving the defendants harmed U.S. interests with their alleged actions.

Assisting Israel in and of itself is not a crime, the judge said. He is also allowing defendants to call senior Bush administration officials, including U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to testify. Those obstacles have led the government to file a rare pre-trial appeal with the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va.

One Jewish communal leader who requested anonymity told JTA the Kadish arrest is an attempt "to taint the objectivity of jurors ahead of the trial" by creating an impression that spying for Israel has been pervasive.

Other U.S. Jewish leaders speculated whether the motive for the Kadish arrest was political, to give President George W. Bush more leverage in pressing Israel in peace talks. Bush will be travelling to the Middle East this month for Israel's 60th anniversary, and Israel has yet to agree to attend a summit in the Egyptian coastal city Sharm el-Sheik in the third week of May.

Bush's lame-duck status has hobbled his effectiveness, and he is eager for progress in Israeli-Palestinian peace talks that he helped relaunch last fall in Annapolis, Md.

"It's not easy trying to conduct policy in Washington when you know that there is a powerful pro-Israel constituency out there that says otherwise," said Lenny ben-David, a former Israeli diplomat and a former AIPAC staffer. "One re-occurring tactic is to try to whittle support for Israel. So we get the occasional story of a spy, of weaponry sales to China, and it serves to whittle away the U.S.-Israel relationship."

Another theory suggests that Israel might have leaked the information implicating Kadish in a bid to head off congressional inquiries into its Sept. 6, 2007 air strike on Syria.

According to this theory, espoused last week in the American Conservative by former CIA agent Philip Giraldi, conservative Republicans in Congress and in the Bush administration want to use information implicating Syria and North Korea in nuclear weapons co-operation to tamp down outreach to both countries.

Anonymous sources in the U.S. State Department told the New York Times last week that this was why the administration decided to release video evidence last Thursday of North Koreans working at the Syrian site just before it was destroyed by Israel's air strike.

Giraldi suggested that Israeli doves who support Israel-Syria talks leaked the information on Kadish to create a distraction and scuttle efforts to further isolate the Assad regime.

"The leak of the information at the present time is believed to be linked to proposed closed congressional hearings at the end of [April] in which the White House had planned to use several Israeli intelligence officers to provide evidence on the alleged Syrian nuclear program that was bombed on September 6, 2007," he wrote. "It is now unlikely that Israeli intelligence officers will allow themselves to be questioned because they would almost certainly be asked about Israeli spying on the U.S."

As for Kadish, if the complaint sheet filed by FBI agents is true, he may have set his own trap by accepting a phone call on March 20 from his alleged former Israeli handler, Yosef Yagur.

According to the complaint, Yagur called just hours after Kadish apparently had been truthful with investigators in a first interview, and he urged Kadish to lie in subsequent interviews. The call was recorded.

Kadish allegedly lied in the March 21 interview, saying he had not spoken with Yagur – extending a conspiracy that otherwise ostensibly had ended in November 1985 to the March 20 phone call.

Israel to join OECD

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel has taken the first step in joining the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, an alliance of countries promoting democracy and economic well-being.

Recently, the Paris-based OECD approved Israel's membership in its Development Center, whose mandate is to forge links between developed and developing nations.

Membership in the centre is considered a step toward membership in the OECD.

If Israel is accepted as a full member of the OECD, it will be only the second country in the Middle East after Turkey to be one.

By all accounts, Israel's membership in the Development Center was in part made possible by the work of the Jewish National Fund in the Third World.

Founded in 1901, the JNF, a non-governmental organization, has played a significant role in developing land and reclaiming water in Israel.

The JNF has been in the forefront of managing open spaces and forests, halting desertification, reclaiming rivers and streams and conserving soil and water.

In recent years, the JNF has been involved in a wide range of international projects in East Timor, Indonesia, Mexico, Niger, Jordan and Kenya, among other nations, said Michal Marmary, a JNF foreign media adviser in Israel.

In an interview, Marmary said that JNF experts have been active in East Timor in establishing tree nurseries for the purpose of reclaiming forests that were damaged during East Timor's secession from Indonesia.

The JNF has also worked with the International Arid Land Consortium on projects designed to prevent desertification in such countries as Mexico, Chile, Paraguay, Niger, Burkina Faso, Turkey, Jordan and El Salvador. As well, the JNF made a stellar contribution by finding a tiny but powerful predator to control gall wasps, which have ravaged eucalyptus groves in Israel the Mediterranean basin, Africa and the Far East, Marmary said.

"These wasps have expanded their range, causing damage to eucalyptus trees," she added.

Eucalypus groves in Israel and Africa are important for a number of reasons. she explained.

They provide shade in recreational areas, are a source of timber for domestic consumption and are a major source of nectar and pollen for honeybees.

In July, JNF experts plan to visit Rwanda to provide instruction and training in agro forestry.

At around the same time, Israeli scientists will go to Kenya to ascertain why certain trees have not taken root.

Marmary suggested that all these efforts have helped Israel become a member of the OECD's Development Center.

Gordimer may pull out of writers' fest

By DAVID B. GREEN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — South African writer Nadine Gordimer may pull out of her scheduled appearance next month at Jerusalem's International Writers Festival in the face of a widespread campaign pressuring her to cancel.

The 84-year-old Gordimer, winner of the 1991 Nobel Prize in literature, is scheduled to make three appearances at the festival, which runs at Mishkenot Sha'ananim May 11 to 15.

Other writers slated to attend include Americans Nathan Englander, Jonathan Safran Foer and Russell Banks, as well as Israelis David Grossman and Amos Oz, the latter of whom is scheduled to share the stage with Gordimer on May 12.

"I am dealing with the issue now," Gordimer told Ha'aretz in a telephone conversation from her home in Johannesburg on Friday. She refused to comment further on the controversy, except to say she would soon make a public statement on her decision.

Gordimer has received dozens of appeals, many of them posted online, calling on her to join a cultural boycott of Israel.

Gordimer, who is Jewish, has long been identified with left-wing causes, including her longtime backing of the African National Congress dating back to the apartheid period, when the black liberation movement was outlawed. In 2001, she publicly urged her friend Susan Sontag not to come to Jerusalem, where the late American writer was to be honoured with the Jerusalem Prize at the capital's biennial international book fair. Sontag did come in the end, and received the literary award in person.

Now it is Gordimer who is being pressed to stay away from Israel. For example, an open letter earlier this month signed by British professors Hilary and Steven Rose, who have led the Jewish lobby in the U.K. campaigning for a boycott of Israeli academia, implored her not to "give the Israeli establishment, the Israeli press, the whole Israeli PR machine, the prize they want – your apparent condoning of their policies."

Yael Nahari, the director of the Jerusalem's International Writers Festival, told Ha'aretz that, following a request from Gordimer, she is trying to arrange for the South African writer to "meet the other side [Palestinians]," including students at al-Quds University in Jerusalem. Nahari was optimistic that Gordimer will go ahead with her planned appearance at the five-day festival. "I think she'll come," she said

In related developments, South Africa reportedly dropped its bid to host a second UN anti-racism conference in Durban.

The 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban became a fury of anti-Israel and anti-Jewish hatred. South Africa had indicated interest in hosting the anti-racism conference again, but Jewish activists said last-Thursday they were optimistic the 2009 World Conference Against Racism would be held at the United Nations in Geneva.

The Geneva-based UN Watch, a watchdog group that monitors UN bodies for bias, said South Africa had backed off its request to handle the 2009 conference.

Jewish groups in Geneva monitoring preparations for the 2009 parley said some UN officials and western countries want to avoid a repeat of the 2001 conference and believe that holding the 2009 event on UN turf will help guarantee certain protocols and security.

IDF foils Hamas attack

Israeli forces foiled a massive Palestinian assault on a key Gaza Strip border crossing last week. Using armoured cars and two explosives-laden jeeps painted as Israeli military vehicles, Hamas terrorists rammed into the Kerem Shalom border terminal before dawn last Saturday. Israeli soldiers at first responded with small-arms fire, but took cover as the jeeps were blown up by their drivers. In parallel, another Hamas armoured car tried to smash through the Gaza-Israel border fence north of Kerem Shalom, but was destroyed by tank fire. Thirteen soldiers were wounded in the Kerem Shalom incident, and four Hamas gunmen were killed. Six Hamas gunmen and another Palestinian were killed in later Israeli air strikes in Gaza.

Israelis split on Golan

About half of Israelis would support ceding all or some of the Golan Heights under a peace deal with Syria, a poll found. According to a survey in last Friday's Yediot Achronot, 32 per cent would agree to Syria's demand for a full return of the Golan in exchange for a comprehensive peace deal, while 17 per cent would support only a partial handover of the strategic plateau. Fifty-one per cent of Israelis want to keep all of the Golan, which Israel captured in the 1967 Six Day War and later annexed, even if this comes at the cost of peace with Syria. The poll, of 500 respondents, which has a 4.5 per cent margin of error, found that Israeli distrust of Syrian President Bashar Assad runs deep despite his recent offers to revive peace talks. Seventy-four per cent of Israelis believe Assad is "not serious" about seeking peace.

Jerusalemite elected in Italy

Italy's new parliament includes a resident of Jerusalem. Florence-born journalist Fiamma Nirenstein, who has lived in Jerusalem's Gilo neighbourhood for the past decade, was elected to the Italian Chamber of Deputies as a member of Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi's centre-right People of Liberty party. The first session of the new parliament was to begin April 29. Nirenstein directed the Italian Cultural Institute in Tel Aviv in the 1990s. The author of many books, she has been a correspondent for several newspapers and has written widely on the Mideast, Israel, anti-Semitism and the rise of militant Islam.

Guards killed

A Palestinian killed two Israeli security guards at the Netzanei Oz industrial zone on the West Bank boundary. Two Israelis in their 50s who were checking Palestinian labourers as they entered the zone last Friday were shot dead by an assailant who fled the scene. Hamas and Islamic Jihad claimed joint responsibility for the attack.

Fighting erupts in Gaza

Palestinians fired three Qassam rockets at southern Israel on Sunday. Two exploded in Sderot and a third hit Kibbutz Zikim, south of Ashkelon. On Monday, Islamic Jihad and two other Palestinian groups launched rockets at Sderot from Beit Hanoun. One exploded near a housing complex. There were no injuries. In response, Israeli troops shelled a house in Beit Hanoun from which they saw fire being directed at soldiers. Palestinian sources said seven people were killed, including four young siblings and their mother. Nine more rockets and nine mortar shells were also launched at the western Negev Monday. In a separate incident, IDF soldiers killed a terrorist from Islamic Jihad during fighting in the area.

Eugene Levy receives lifetime achievement award

By BENJAMIN GLEISSER
Special to The CJN

He's got Groucho Marx's eyebrows and a sense of humour that's as subtle as a whoopee cushion on the rabbi's chair – but the jokes only flow when Eugene Levy is writing films or performing onstage. Offstage, Levy is soft-spoken, grateful for every laugh he earns and modest about the accolades he receives.

Levy, 62, is one of six artists who will receive the Governor General's Performing Arts Award for lifetime achievement, an honour that will be presented May 2 in Ottawa by Gov.-Gen. Michaëlle Jean. The award consists of a commemorative medallion struck by the Royal Canadian Mint and a $25,000 prize.

"Eugene Levy's unique contribution to sketch comedy put Canadian comedy on the map, and the quality of his work in television and film, as an actor, writer and comedian leaves no question of his mastery of his craft," said Debbie Henning, executive director of the Governor General's Performing Arts Awards Foundation. "He has also chosen to remain Canadian and support Canadian artists – a fact that he proudly promotes."

Levy said he was thrilled and surprised to win the award. And what makes the honour extra sweet, he said, is that acting awards such as Junos, Oscars and Tonys are almost always won by "serious" actors, and not by comic actors like himself.

"There's the idea that comedy doesn't take a lot of work, or comics aren't credible actors, so it's always a kick when we get recognized for our hard work," he said in a telephone interview from his California home.

"The ironic thing about the world of comedy is the perception that comedians are people who need to stand up in front of people and get the approval of a crowd, and can't wait to get a laugh. But I've always been more on the shy side. I'm not an introvert, but I'd rather stand in the back of the room and watch those performers to see what's funny.

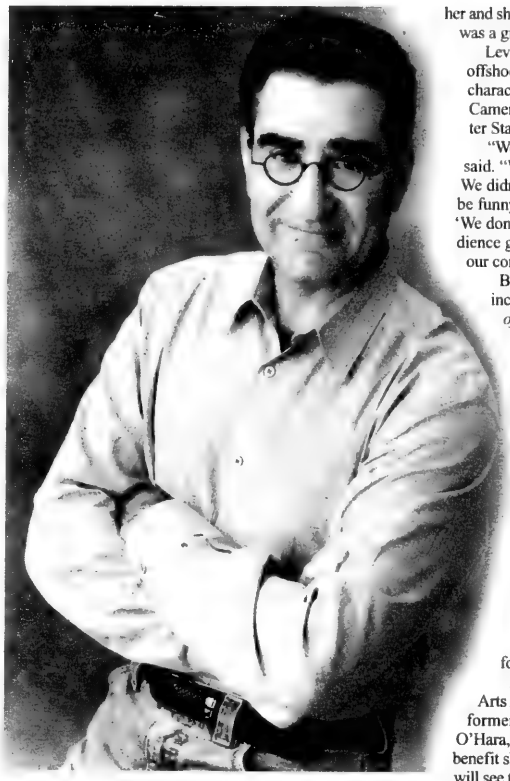
"Jews make good storytellers, but I'm not sure I can tell a good story. But I always find it a delight to listen to great storytellers. I'm not an innately funny person. Instead, I get laughs through the characters I play."

One character he didn't get to play was Toby Ziegler, the U.S. president's communications director on the TV show The West Wing.

"I read for the part several times," Levy said. "The show's creators kept finding my readings amusing, so I thought I didn't have much chance, but they kept calling me back for another audition. The part ended up going to Richard Schiff, and he was amazing in the series."

Born in Hamilton in 1946, Levy began acting in school plays, where he was comfortable being part of an ensemble.

"I wasn't funny as a kid," he said. "My memory of my bar mitzvah is kind of vague, but I remember feeling a little awkward up at the bimah in front of everyone. I was pretty self-conscious, but I wasn't nervous and I didn't flub anything."



Eugene Levy

He began writing comedy in high school, jotting "odd life bits" into a journal. After graduating from McMaster University with a theatre degree, he was cast in the Toronto production of the musical Godspell with Martin Short, Andrea Martin and blossoming comedian Gilda Radner, who went on to star in Saturday Night Live. Her death in 1989 of ovarian cancer helped increase public awareness for earlier detection of the disease.

"Right from the start, you knew Gilda had an amazing personality," he remembered. "She went to the Godspell audition with Zippity Do Da, and you felt sorry for this poor, sweet girl who had no idea what song to audition with. But everyone loved her and she got the part, and we all saw how funny she was. She was a great kid."

Levy joined Second City in 1973, and later, the television offshoot SCTV, where, from 1976 through 1984, he created characters that fans still remember: nerdy newscaster Earl Camembert, Las Vegas comic Bobby Bittman, polkameister Stan Schmenge and a comatose Perry Como.

"We really started out doing that show for ourselves," he said. "We didn't even know if anyone would be watching. We didn't even know if what we were writing was going to be funny. Our producers used to read our material and say, 'We don't get this.' And we said, 'It doesn't matter if the audience gets it, we get it.' After the show became successful, our confidence level went way up."

Besides television, Levy has appeared in about 50 films, including National Lampoon's Vacation, Splash, Father of the Bride and American Pie. He also co-wrote and starred in the satirical "mockumentaries" For Your Consideration, A Mighty Wind (for which he won a Grammy Award and was named best supporting actor by the New York Film Critics Circle), Best in Show and Waiting for Guffman. Other awards and honours include five Canadian Comedy Awards (two for best writing and three for best male performer), two Emmy Awards and a star on Canada's Walk of Fame.

Levy is also known in Canada for his volunteer work with charities like The Clinton Foundation, which raises money for causes in Africa; Families for Early Autism Treatment; Sick Kids Hospital; and Shalom Village, a nursing home in Hamilton.

"My philosophy is if you've been blessed in life, then you give back whatever you can," he said. "I have some relations in Shalom Village, so doing work for them was a no-brainer for me."

After picking up the Governor General's Performing Arts Award, Levy will head to Toronto to reunite with his former Second City cohorts Andrea Martin, Catherine O'Hara, Martin Short, Dave Thomas and others for a May 5 benefit show for the Second City alumni fund. Later this year will see the release of his next film, Gooby, in which he plays the villainous Mr. Nerdlinger.

And after that – more comic acting. Which means, despite winning the prestigious artistic honour, he does not plan to show off by doing King Lear at the Stratford Shakespeare Festival.

"If I tried Lear, it would probably still turn out funny," he said.

An analysis of events and trends in the Middle East

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Robin Wright, a well-known American journalist, has reported from Middle East capitals for years. Her latest book, Dreams and Shadows: The Future of the Middle East (Penguin Press), will be of interest to readers who seek more than just a cursory understanding of a complex region in constant turmoil and flux.

Robin Wright

Wright, who has been on the staff of the Washington Post and the Los Angeles Times, ranges far and wide as she analyzes developments and trends in Egypt, Lebanon, Syria, Iran, Morocco and Iraq, and among the Palestinians.

Although she deals with Israel in passing, as she must, she does not, strangely enough, devote a complete chapter to the Jewish state. This is quite an omission for a writer striving to get to the bottom of things.

As befits any good journalist, Wright is a realist and a pragmatist. But sometimes, as at the beginning of her tour d'horizon, her judgments are questionable.

She acknowledges that Islamic extremism has progressively grown into a major force, but claims it is no longer "the most important, interesting or dynamic" force in the Mideast. Instead, she says, "a budding culture of change" challenging the status quo should be regarded as "the preferred means of making political decisions and producing change" today.

In this connection, Wright observes that "a major engine of change is youth." Given the fact that the Mideast has witnessed a seven-fold explosion in population over only three generations, Arab regimes that fail to provide sufficient jobs and housing may well face threats to their legitimacy.

And while there is an element of truth in this argument, Wright herself admits that nascent reform movements throughout the Arab world, particularly in Syria and Egypt, have been pushed aside or simply crushed.

In Egypt, the first Arab country to sign a peace treaty with Israel, emergency law has been in effect since then-president Anwar Sadat was assassinated by Islamic radicals in 1981. And in Syria, the deeply entrenched Baathist regime, headed by Bashar Assad, has arrested reformers and warned them that Syria's stability is of paramount importance.

Wright admits that free and fair elections, a laudable goal in an area blighted by autocracy, have not produced the desired results.

The example that immediately comes to mind is the 2006 election in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, during which Hamas defeated Fatah, with all its sombre and still unfolding consequences. If this is democracy, who needs it?

Another example is Iraq, still occupied by the United States and its allies following the 2003 invasion to oust that arch-dictator, Saddam Hussein.

Democracy has indeed begun to stir in Iraq, but the disintegration of Iraq since the allied invasion has evoked fond memories of the previous dictatorship and emboldened Arab strongmen who prefer the stick to the carrot.

I agree with Wright's thesis that the three pivotal events that redefined the region in the 20th century were the fall of the Ottoman Empire in 1918, the creation of Israel in 1948 and the Iranian revolution in 1979.

Regrettably, Wright does not flesh out these themes, but in her discussion of Lebanon, she elaborates at length on the two forces, identity and youth, that will be at the heart of change in the Mideast for decades to come.

In a reference to the so-called Cedar Revolution, which compelled Syria to withdraw its army from Lebanon, Wright describes it as "the first broad popular movement to demand sweeping change and get it." But as she rightly points out, it was merely the "opening round" of a much longer political battle.

The same sectarian system that spawned the 1975 civil war is still firmly in place, and Syria – which has yet to officially recognize Lebanon as an independent and sovereign nation – continues to pull the strings.

Wright's analysis of Lebanon's most charismatic political figure, Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, is instructive. Though she credits him with being a shrewd and formidable politician, she exposes him as an intractable individual who cannot come to terms with Israel's existence, who naively believes that Israel is "weaker than a spider web," and who once described the Israelis as "the descendants of apes and pigs."

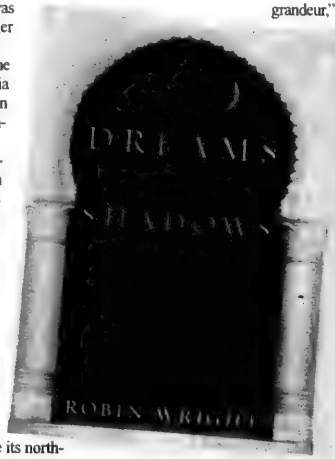
In accordance with other observers, Wright blames Hezbollah for having exposed Lebanon to ruin by forcing a war on it in the summer of 2006.

By taunting Israel with a cross-border raid that prompted Israel to bomb and invade its northern neighbour, Hezbollah not only needlessly sacrificed Lebanese lives, but lost its operational base close to the Israeli border and its element of tactical surprise.

Yet Nasrallah won some points, too. Having fired almost 4,000 rockets into Israel and thereby paralyzed the Galilee, Hezbollah produced what ordinary Arabs have yearned for: military effectiveness. Yet Wright neglects to mention that Egypt set this precedent when the Egyptian army stormed the Bar-Lev Line in the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Not surprisingly, Wright respects Egypt's status in the Arab world. As she puts it, "Egypt has the clout to bestow legitimacy on any idea, and to change the direction of the region."

Her view of Syria is less generous. "Syria still has illusions of grandeur," she writes, adding that the Syrians are hobbled by a sense of self-importance.



In her opinion, Syria faces serious problems because dissatisfaction with the status quo is growing, spurred by a confluence of demographics, economic realities, international pressure, the rise of the Internet and the collapse of Iraq's Baathist regime.

Wright is hard on that Palestinian icon, the late Yasser Arafat, accusing him of masterminding a series of terrorist incidents, ruling autocratically and turning a blind eye to rampant corruption within the ranks of the Palestinian Authority.

She states that the downfall of Iran's pro-western Pahlavi monarchy was "the only original revolution" in the past century in the Mideast. "It introduced a genuinely new political ideology [and] a unique and aggressive form of political Islam."

She thinks, not without good reason, that the strategic balance of power has begun to shift toward Iran as its allies have grown stronger.

Hamas has reinforced its grip on the Gaza Strip, while Hezbollah held Israel to a draw in the Second Lebanon War. And in Iraq, Shiite militias, apparently armed and trained by Iran, challenge the Americans.

Clearly, the Middle East is in a state of ferment, and in Dreams and Shadows, Wright analyzes events and trends that should be watched carefully in the future.

Toronto Jewish Film Festival offers eclectic choices

Steal a Pencil For Me*, which switches between past and present is a testament to the power of romance.

Steal a Pencil For Me

An improbable love story is the theme of Steal a Pencil For Me, one of the movies scheduled to be shown at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs from May 3-11.

In 1943, three years after Holland was occupied by the German army, a married Jewish accountant named Jaap (Jack) Polak met Ina Soep, a young, eligible woman 10 years his junior. Polak, unhappily married, was smitten, while Ina was less than impressed.

Like many Dutch Jews, Polak and his wife, Manja, were transported to Westerbork, a concentration camp in northeastern Holland that had originally been built for Jewish refugees fleeing fascist oppression. Shortly afterward, Ina arrived in Westerbork, and Polak began to woo her. "He won my heart by sheer persistence," says Ina.

When Manja discovered that they were having an affair, she forbade her husband from seeing Ina. So the pair wrote love letters to each other. "I have the feeling that we completely understand each other," Polak wrote in a letter. These letters, some of which were preserved, form the heart of Steal a Pencil For Me.

The film, which switches back and forth between the past and the present, is a testament to the power of romance and the ties that bind. Even after Polak and Ina were temporarily separated, they never stopped thinking of and yearning for each other. "They lived on their love," says Polak's sister, a resident of Israel today. Having been liberated from Bergen-Belsen, Polak divorced Manja and married Ina. "That was the beginning of my life," he says with some ardour. And this film fleshes out their enduring love match.

In Dutch, English and Hebrew. May 5, noon, Al Green Theatre and May 6, 1 p.m., Sheppard Grande.

Skate to Survive

This documentary, partially set in wartime Holland as well, is about the mother-daughter figure skating dynasty of Ellen and Petra Burka, both of whom were champions.

Directed by Astra Burka, it opens in Holland and ends in Canada, their adopted homeland. Ellen, the focus of Skate to Survive, was born in 1921 in Amsterdam and was brought up in an assimilated household where Christmas and Easter were celebrated. Only by chance did she discover that her parents, originally from Germany, were Jewish.

Burka's documentary charts Ellen's development as a first-rate figure skater, the anti-Semitic restrictions that marginalized Dutch Jews after Germany's invasion, the deportation of her 83-year-old grandmother, Ellen's confinement in Westerbork and Theresienstadt, the kitchen duties that made life a little easier for her, Ellen's ascent in her chosen sport, and her immigration to Canada in the wake of World War II.

What may strike some viewers as jarring is that Ellen and her husband raised their two daughters in the Anglican church. They did so because Toronto was pervasively anti-Semitic in the 1950s and figure-skating clubs seemed allergic to Jewish instructors. After Ellen's marriage broke up, she became a full-time figure-skating coach, shepherding her daughter and another star pupil, Toller Cranston, to Canadian and world titles in the 1960s. Strangely enough, Petra never makes an appearance in the film.

May 6, 5 p.m., Al Green Theatre

Arthur Szyk – Illuminator

This documentary by Pietr Zarebski is a serious portrait of an outstanding illustrator. Szyk, a Polish Jew from Lodz, was simply the greatest 20th-century illuminator working in the style of 16th-century miniaturist painters. Today, 57 years after his untimely passing, he is best remembered for his Passover haggadah, the Statute of Kalisz (which granted Jews in Poland civil and religious privileges), anti-Nazi illustrations, drawings of Israel's struggle for statehood and the U.S. Declaration of Independence.

A child prodigy, Szyk was influenced by Middle Eastern art. A Polish patriot who fought for Poland's freedom and lived in the United States during Germany's occupation of Poland, he produced the Statute of Kalisz to promote tolerance. But Zarebski says not a word about Szyk's reaction to the mounting tide of anti-Semitism in prewar Poland.

Ernst Lubitsch in Berlin

Ernst Lubitsch, the renowned Hollywood director known for his sophisticated comedies, (Ninotchka and The Shop Around the Corner, to name but two), started his career in his birthplace, Germany. Robert Fischer's intriguing film, Ernst Lubitsch in Berlin, rounds out his German period, when he was an actor and a comedian in Paul Davidson's silent films and Max Reinhardt's Deutsche Theatre.

Although he was thoroughly secular, Lubitsch, the son of a Lithuanian immigrant tailor, infused his acting with a Jewish sensibility. By the time he arrived in Hollywood in 1922, Lubitsch was a formidable figure, ready for stardom in the United States.

Nichols and May: Take Two

At the height of their powers in the late 1950s and early 1960s, Mike Nichols and Elaine May were a compelling comedy team whose cutting satire presaged social change in America. Nichols and May: Take Two, by Phillip Schopper, examines their ascendancy as comedians through hilarious skits and interviews with a variety of observers, including their manager. The film, unfortunately, omits vital biographical data about them.

Operation Mural – Casablanca 1961

This interesting film by Yehuda Kaveh hinges on a clandestine plot hatched by Israel to smuggle 530 Jewish children out of Morocco under the nose of the Moroccan government. It revolves around David Littman, a British Jew who volunteered his services for the operation. Unknown to him and his wife, they were actually working under cover for the Mossad. A Moroccan official threatened to expose them as Zionist spies, but he was overruled.

Arab Labor

This feature is taken from a popular Israeli sitcom, written by Sayed Kashua, about an obsessive Israeli Arab who will do virtually anything to assimilate. The episodes, turning on a shady garage mechanic, a Passover seder and a tense encounter between a Jewish suitor and an Arab woman, are satirical and zero in on problems that bedevil Israel's sometimes uneasy relationship with its large Arab minority.

May 7, 7:30 p.m., Al Green Theatre.

Between Two Notes

This meditative film by Amit Breuer, documents how Jews and Arabs in the Middle East have influenced their respective musical traditions. Flitting from Israel and Egypt to Syria and Lebanon, Between Two Notes unreels through grainy file footage, rousing concerts and thoughtful interviews.

May 6, noon, Al Green Theatre.

Ralph Benmergui's edgy TV series about Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ralph Benmergui, the host of Benmergui in the Morning on Jazz.FM91 radio, segues to the Middle East in his five-part Vision TV series, Ralph Benmergui: My Israel, due to be launched on May 5 at 9 p.m. and repeated at midnight.

It can also be seen in a sneak preview on May 4 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at 11:45 a.m., and at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival at 6 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre.

The first episode, which turns on Jerusalem as a microcosm of Israel, sets the tone.

Born in Morocco and raised in Canada, Benmergui is a curious, passionate, restless and edgy observer. But let's be clear. He is not an "objective" reporter in the traditional sense of the word.

Although he acknowledges that Israel courses through his veins, he adds the caveat that he is not a "typical" Jew. He thus questions some of Israel's "actions" and "direction" and the hold Orthodox Jews exert on the Jewish state.

His mission, he declares in boldface, is to find "my Israel."

Prior to embarking on his trip to Israel, a day before Christmas last year, Benmergui, a seasoned broadcaster who was previously with the CBC, visits his mother in her kitchen.

As she blithely rolls meatballs, she advises him to use his judgment and refrain from taking sides.

Since Israel is not just another country in the Middle East for Benmergui, the question that arises is whether he is really impartial. Judging by the first episode, he is critical, but his heart is with Israel.

On a visit to the Western Wall, he equates it with the "indestructibility of my people," but is troubled by the intensity and "idol worship" it evokes.

As he further reflects, Benmergui observes that sorrow seems central to Jewish identity.

Visiting Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial in the foothills of Jerusalem, he muses that "the unthinkable becomes real" here and that its existence is reason enough for Israel to exist.

Paying a visit to Elaine Tal El, an old Toronto friend living in Jerusalem, he discusses the cold reality of life in Israel and the prospect of peace with Tal El, her husband, their daughter and Tal El's sister.

He then meets a secular Palestinian filmmaker, Mohammed El Attar, who guides him through the labyrinthine Old City.

Noting that Jerusalem has become "holier than thou," El Attar says that "bricks" should not be worshipped.

In passing, he admits he first heard about the Holocaust when he was 28 years old. Is his admission an implicit rebuke of Palestinian society?

In closing, Benmergui travels to Bethlehem, where he confronts "the bleak reality" of the wall, Israel's security barrier.

"To be in the West Bank as a Jew feels odd," he confesses. Yet he is not sure whether he feels more Jewish or Canadian in Bethlehem.

His honesty is refreshing.

In future episodes, scheduled to be broadcast until May 7, Benmergui will deal with race and class in Israel through the eyes of Moroccan and Ethiopian Jews and Israeli Arabs, Orthodox and Reform Jews, and Israel's future.

Benmergui being Benmergui, these segments are bound to be quirky, unconventional and never less than interesting.

The prince and the bat mitzvah girl

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The following three movies, from Germany, Israel and France respectively, show the international diversity of films at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival. In all, 12 countries are represented at the festival.

Max Minsky and Me

In this German movie, Nellie Edelmeister is a 13-year-old girl in Berlin preparing for her bat mitzvah. But the Hebrew lessons bore her to death.

Nellie is interested only in astronomy and outer space, and her crush on Prince Edouard of Luxembourg, a handsome teenager who is also interested in astronomy.

Nellie is studious and clever, but typically, she's a klutz in sports. When her school announces that the basketball team will be playing a tournament in Luxembourg hosted by the charming prince, Nellie is determined to make the team at all costs.

Enter the new kid in school, Max Minsky, who happens to be good at basketball. Nellie talks him into giving her basketball lessons in exchange for doing his homework and gives him the fees his mother is paying her to tutor him.

Much to her mother's chagrin, Nellie starts skipping Hebrew lessons to practise basketball to achieve her only shot at meeting the prince.

Along the way, she learns about herself and her faith.

Max Minsky and Me is a delightful and charming coming-of-age movie that will please adults and teens. Highly recommended.

In German with subtitles. May 4, 1 p.m. Al Green Theatre and May 6, 6 p.m. Sheppard Grande.

No Exit

This Israeli feature is a commentary on the recent popularity of reality TV shows and asks the question, just how far would a TV show go to boost its ratings?

The show in question is called Choice of Heart, a mixture of Big Brother and The Bachelor. Ten young women and one man live in a house, their every action captured on camera. The women vie for the heart of the man, who eliminates one of them each week, and at the end the winner gets a cash prize and marries him.

What the women don't know is that the man is blind. A conscientious objector who served in Lebanon, Eitan comes out of the war psychosomatically blind. The producers of the show outfit him with a special set of glasses with a camera that allows them to see what he "sees." Backstage, his rehabilitation therapist, Yael, directs his movement through a special prosthetic in his ear, telling him what he "sees" and directs his actions around the house.

Conceptually, this is intriguing, and actually would have made quite an interesting TV show. But after the setup, the first half of this movie moves with the pace of a soap opera. It's only toward the last half hour that the movie picks up, when some suspense is thrown in and the twists and turns start happening.

When the police are called in to deal with an accident in the house, the cop is also part of another reality show. When one of the girls is taken to hospital, there is a camera in the ambulance, presumably for yet another reality show, and you realize just how much of our culture TV reality shows have penetrated. This is really not far from the truth is it?

The ending makes you realize that there is nothing these so-called reality shows wouldn't do to prop up their slagging ratings.

Though it could have been better, No Exit is an interesting satire and commentary on reality TV shows and our fascination with voyeurism.

In Hebrew with subtitles. May 6, 8:30 p.m. Sheppard Grande.

Bad Faith

Can intermarriage work?

In this French film, Clara and Ismael have been dating for four years. Clara is Jewish and Ismael is Muslim, and they're very much in love.

Then Clara tells Ismael that she's pregnant. They're both happy about it. But it's time to tell their parents about each other, and it all goes downhill from there.

"Is he one of us?" her mother asks.

"French? Yes."

"OK, but is he…"

"No. He isn't."

"That's OK," her mother says. "We like the Sephardim, too."

Meanwhile, Ismael can't bring himself to tell his mother about Clara and complications begin.

Clara even begins to wonder just what being Jewish means. It's all about guilt, her friend tells her. "Maybe being Jewish is like eating Italian panini on Pesach and losing sleep over it."

Clara and Ismael begin to quarrel with each other over the mezuzah she insists on hanging outside their door and what to name the baby. Ismael begins to quarrel with his friends about Mideast politics.

No matter how much they love each other, it becomes obvious that the cultural differences hang like albatrosses around their necks.

Filled with misunderstandings and miscommunications, this modern-day Romeo and Juliet is a wonderful, moving movie.The ending is a nail-biting thriller as Ismael races across Paris to prevent a horrible tragedy.

Bad Faith is a warm, moving and at times funny movie about mixed race relationships and goes a long way to show the cultural similarities that such seemingly opposing ethnicities have. Well worth watching.

In French with subtitles. May 5, 8:30 p.m. Bloor Cinema, and May 7, 3:30 p.m. Sheppard Grande.

Documentary recounts the plight of Sudanese refugees in Israel

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Two documentaries at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival tell stories about families torn apart – one during the Holocaust, the other during what has been called the first genocide of the 21st century. Themes of courage and bravery are common to both films, as are a desire on the part of the films' subjects to educate the public.

Shield of Solomon

The first documentary, directed by Igal Hecht and Lior Cohen (also written and produced by Hecht), is a visually and emotionally stunning recounting of the plight of Sudanese refugees in Israel.

The world has taken little notice as black Christians from southern Sudan have been attacked, raped and murdered by Arab groups called Janjaweed. Some would-be victims decided to act, by setting out on foot across the Sinai desert towards the nearest democratic country, Israel.

More than 2,000 refugees arrived in Israel during 2006 and 2007, some of whom were deported back to Egypt, some were sent to jail, and many others were left to fend for themselves on the street.

The film spends equal time examining Israeli volunteers who work to find food, shelter, medical assistance and jobs for the refugees, and the history and life stories of the refugees themselves.

Included are bleak scenes of men displaying their scars, both physical and emotional, that they received both at the hands of the Janjaweed and from Egyptian police. Equally heart-wrenching is the sight of women and children playing together in the yard of an Israeli prison, their only offence being that they crossed illegally into the country.

Interspersed are interviews and scenes taken from rallies and demonstrations, as the Sudanese and Israeli activists try to spread information about their plight, and pressure the government to stop deportations.

TEATRON SEEKS ACTORS FOR A GLIMPSE OF THE LIGHT AND THE DYBBUK

Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre is seeking actors for two upcoming productions at the Leah Posluns Theatre, both directed by Ari Weisberg. A Glimpse of the Light, a musical by Ben Finn, is a love story in the era just before the birth of the State of Israel; it is to be staged in November. The second play is The Dybbuk, by Sholom Anski, the famous romantic drama set in a simple village in eastern Europe, slated for performance next February.

Auditions for these non-union, non-paying positions are scheduled for May 27 and 29. Please send your resumé and photo by e-mail to teatron@ sympatico.ca; or by mail to Ari Weisberg, artistic director, Teatron Theatre, 41 Warwick Ave., Toronto M6C 1T7. For further information, phone 416-781-5527 or visit the website www.teatrontheatre.com.

Names in the News: Toronto writer Jonathan Garfinkel's book Ambivalence, about his experiences in Israel and the Palestinian territories, is "a melodious choral work" that artfully weaves together "many disparate voices from the two cultures," according to a review in the Jewish Chronicle of London, England, where a British edition of the book is on sale. Garfinkel "spins superb scenes and displays a patient listening ear" but is even-handed to a fault, the reviewer concludes, noting that twice in the book people call him a "self-hating Jew."

TJFF documentaries feature themes of courage and bravery

One social activist, Elisheva, reports that as the grandchild of Holocaust survivors, she feels bound to help people who have no other safe haven. Without government funding, Elisheva and other volunteers scrounge for basic necessities for refugee families, but admit that even Israeli jails and cramped apartments are better than what these men and women left behind.

No government responses to criticism over the handling of the crisis are included in the film. The only official statement included is two excerpts from speeches Prime Minister Ehud Olmert gave in the Knesset, in which he says that the refugees are not Israel's responsibility. It would give the film more balance to have included an interview with a government official.

May 6, 2:30 p.m. and May 8, 3:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre.

My Opposition: The diaries of Friedrich Kellner

This documentary, directed by Fern Levitt and Arnie Zipursky, also focuses on themes of courage in the face of deadly risk.

Friedrich Kellner, a World War I veteran, was a mid-level official in a small district courthouse in Nazi Germany. He had read Mein Kampf, Hitler's book detailing his dangerous views, and tried to warn others against the Nazis, to no avail.

While resisting joining the Nazi party, at risk to his life, Friedrich wrote diaries documenting events and the dangers of totalitarianism, as a warning to future generations. He was unable to fight the Nazis in the present, so worked to oppose them in the future. Some of his diaries were destroyed out of fear that they would be discovered when he was called before a tribunal to explain his opposition to the Nazis.

Kellner's only child, Fred, became influenced by the Hitler ideology, and the family decided to send him to America. There, Fred married a Jewish woman, and they had three children together. The marriage was shaky and soon Fred returned to Germany. Their mother left the children at a Jewish orphanage.

After being raised in the orphanage, Friedrich's youngest grandson, Robert Scott Kellner, joined the U.S. Navy. After two years of being stationed in Virginia, he was sent to Saudi Arabia, with a stopover in Frankfurt, Germany. He wanted to learn more about his grandparents, so he went AWOL to visit his grandparents' town.

He eventually found their town and then met his grandparents for the first time. He was given the diaries and was relieved to learn that his grandparents had not been Nazis and had in fact resisted the regime. Thirty-five years after their deaths, Kellner seeks to publicize the work of his grandparents and document their lives.

The film mixes interviews with Kellner and historians, footage and photographs that illustrate the lives of the Kellner family in Germany and in the United States and startling footage of the events of World War II. Some of the explanation of historical events in the film, for example Kristallnacht and Hitler's rise to power, are unnecessary for most audiences and distract from the unique story being told.

May 6, 7:30 p.m. Al Green Theatre. Robert Scott Kellner will be in attendance. For tickets and other information, visit www.tjff.com.

Novel's poetic sensibility is preserved in movie

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

We are all prisoners of memory, for better or worse.

In Fugitive Pieces, adapted from Anne Michaels' eponymous novel, Jakob Beer, the main protagonist, is inextricably enmeshed in the past, which to him remains a source of unspeakable pain and anguish.

As portrayed in Jeremy Podeswa's contemplative and shattering movie – which premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival and starts in local theatres on May 2 – Jakob is burdened and immobilized by the Holocaust, the defining event of his life.

Torn by guilt as a survivor, and unable to jettison the horrific images that haunt and torment him, Jakob is a victim. The fragility and complexity of Jakob's emotional state, burned into his consciousness by the cold-blooded murder of his parents and the abduction and disappearance of his sister in Poland in 1942, is ably transferred to the screen by Podeswa, the screenwriter and director.

His task is to preserve Michaels' poetic sensibility and connect interlocking themes of loss and love, and in this respect, he succeeds admirably.

Moving seamlessly in flashbacks between war-torn Poland, the idyllic Greek islands and Toronto of the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, Fugitive Pieces opens in kinetic fashion as nine-year-old Jakob witnesses an act of untrammelled Nazi brutality. Running into the forest after his parents are killed and his sister is dragged away by anonymous thugs, Jakob (Robbie Kay) finds shelter in a clearing, covering himself with leaves.

Athos Roussos (Rade Sherbedgia), a compassionate Greek archeologist working on an excavation, stumbles upon the frightened Jewish boy and resolves to save him from the tender mercies of the Nazis. Smuggling him out of Poland, he takes him to his home on the island of Zakynthos, which is also occupied by Germany. There, in fear of the Germans, Jakob keeps a low profile.

At this point, the film fast forwards to Toronto, where Jakob (Stephen Dillane), now a writer, falls in love with the beautiful, outgoing Alex (Rosamund Pike), his polar opposite temperamentally. They marry, but it is an uneasy relationship. Alex, a social butterfly, lives for the moment. Jakob, a loner who savours solitude, wallows in his fleeting Holocaust experience. She is insensitive to his deep-seated feelings, while he cannot tolerate her "shameless vitality."

It is a prescription for marital breakdown.

These scenes, directed with panache, establish Jakob's inability to shake off his obsession with the murder of his parents and the disappearance of his sister, a promising pianist.

Returning to Greece, Podeswa fleshes out Jakob's growing dependence on Athos, a generous, open-hearted person who is also tormented by demons.

Wracked by nightmares, Jakob sleeps fitfully. As the Nazi reign of terror unfolds on Athos' bucolic island, he shelters a young couple and their infant child whom the Germans want to arrest and deport. The wife is Christian and the husband is Jewish.

Greece's liberation from the yoke of Nazi tyranny is heralded by a scene in which a convoy of trucks with fighters and fluttering Greek flags rolls by. With the war having ended, Athos accepts a university teaching position in Canada, and Jakob accompanies him to Toronto.

Maturing into a poised, intelligent young man, Jakob is a solitary though not asocial individual. He forms lasting friendships with neighbours and fellow survivors with whom he can converse in Latvian-inflected Yiddish. And while he dreams of his lost, beloved sister, he longs for the day when his bitter memories of her will no longer distract him.

In terms of emotional resonance, Fugitive Pieces, whose ending has been altered since its world premiere last summer, gathers power in heart-felt scenes during which Jakob romances the new woman in his life, the museum curator Michaela, played sensitively by Israeli actress Ayelet Zurer.

For Jakob, Michaela is a miracle. Unlike Alex, she completely understands and empathizes with his obsessions, and can probably give him a normal and perhaps blissful future.

Relentlessly sombre in tone and substance, Fugitive Pieces, produced by Robert Lantos, is a showcase for the talents of a fine cast.

Kay is preternaturally mature, and Dillane, brooding and intellectual, is a steady and reliable presence. Zurer bonds with him in a few brief and affecting scenes. Pike is convincing, while Sherbedgia, shaggy and warm, may remind a viewer of Anthony Quinn in Zorba the Greek.

The horror of the Holocaust often eludes comprehension, but in Fugitive Pieces, Podeswa leaves viewers with an understanding that unbridled terror and a yearning for normality are not necessarily opposing forces.

Yael Naim: 'Far Far' from ordinary

Yael Naim
Yael Naim and David Donatien
Warner Music

Reviewed by By Adam Menceles

Gifted with a soothing voice and a pair of talented ivory-tickling fingers, French-born and Israeli-raised Yael Naim has put together a collection of relaxing yet uplifting tunes.

Singing in English, Hebrew and French, she freely floats between all three languages – giving her music an eclectic language blending quality. It's safe to say that Naim's accent is somewhat alluring, maybe even sensual at times.

Now, Naim is in no way a behind-the-scenes songstress. Her hit New Soul is featured in Apple's new Macbook Air television commercial, which is what did it for her in terms of popularity.

The result is that she is the first Israeli solo artist ever to have a top 10 hit in America. Her tunes are subdued yet catchy, emitting an old-world vibe similar to that of a Parisian jazz club.

Her musical background as a singing soloist in the Israeli Air Force Orchestra is out of the ordinary and probably quite different from that of most of today's hit makers.

Naim's self-titled album (recorded in Paris over a period of two years and released in 2007) is a collaboration with percussionist David Donatien and continues to stay at the top of the charts.

Notable songs include the obvious New Soul, as well as the short but sweet Paris and the hook-driven sleeper hit Far Far.

If you're a fan of Israeli music, French music, relaxing ditties or musically talented Israelis, Naim is where it's at. If you think you don't like those qualities in your songs, listen to her anyway and within one week you'll be patting yourself on the back saying, "You know what, Yael is a little bit of all right."

Koffler Centre to support future programs

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Eighteen months ago, Lori Starr packed her bags and moved her family from Los Angeles to Toronto to take the helm at the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Starr is Koffler Centre's executive director and the vice-president of culture, a new position, for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Established by Murray and Marvelle Koffler in 1977, the Koffler Centre of the Arts was created to enrich the people of Toronto through arts education and exhibitions.

This year, Starr and Tiana Koffler Boyman, the centre's president, are steering it in new directions. "The institution is being rebirthed with a new mission statement – to create a more civil and global society by fostering mutual understanding through the exploration of arts and culture," Starr said.

To support their efforts, the Koffler Centre of the Arts will host a gala on May 4, presenting an evening of international ballet stars at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts.

The seventh annual Stars of the 21st Century, under the artistic direction of Nadia and Solomon Tencer, features classical and contemporary ballet dancers from Germany, Lithuania, Russia, Spain and Vienna. The show includes principal dancers from the National Ballet of Canada and a world première by the Israel Ballet company to commemorate Israel @ 60, featuring dancers Nina Gershman and Alexander Utkin.

No stranger to the arts, Starr was former senior vice-president of the Skirball Cultural Center and director of the Skirball Museum in Los Angeles, as well as having held senior management positions at the J. Paul Getty Museum and at the J. Paul Getty Trust for more than 15 years.

Programs at the Koffler Centre of the Arts are based on a multi-disciplinary approach with an emphasis on Jewish themes in a Canadian context and feature filmmakers, writers, comedians, musicians, dancers and painters.

"Here within our curving spaces," an installation by Montreal artist Karilee Fuglem, opens at the Koffler Gallery on May 15.

The exhibit "Makom: Seeking Sacred Space," more than 30 photographs of Jewish sacred sites from Montreal to Morocco by David Cowles and David Kaufman, begins at the gallery on June 1.

An Israeli film festival, presented by iToronto, is on at the centre this fall and, coming next spring, a celebration of Russian culture through film and art, music and food.

"I am indebted to Tiana Koffler Boyman's efforts to create the Koffler Centre of the Arts as an independent agency of the UJA Federation and to her parents for their generosity in envisioning an arts centre as a key component of Jewish life in Toronto," Starr said. Toronto has a "unique Jewish community that's a model for other cities, with the most progressive, robust and visionary federation – the United Jewish Appeal – that's ahead of its time."

To reach out to people in the community, the Koffler Centre "embraces" everyone, building on the notion of welcoming the stranger, she said. Through the recognition of differences, "people are valued as individuals and become part of something greater."

With Starr's belief that the "essence of an institution can be taken anywhere," the Koffler Centre recently celebrated the release of Chana Rothman's CD We Can Rise at the Gladstone Hotel, to attract the under 40 crowd. Plans for more off-site concerts include the Italian-Czech Connection Mother's Day Concert with the Koffler Chamber Orchestra at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on May 11.

Lori Starr

"We create a sense of community through the notion of culture – it's the lens through which we examine what people value," Starr said. "Culture is the soul of who we are. Once we do this, great things happen."

For Stars of the 21st Century tickets, visit www.ticketmaster.ca. Call 416-872-1111 for gala patron tickets; to be a gala sponsor, contact Tobi Liederman at 416-636-1880, ext. 271, or e-mail events@kofflerarts.org. Gala sponsors attend private functions before and after the performance at 8:00 pm. For more information about the Koffler Centre, visit www.kofflercentre.com.

One member's brush with horror changes Montreal family dynamic

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Colleen Murphy's play The December Man (L'homme de décembre), inspired by the 1989 massacre of 14 women at the École Polytechnique in Montreal, examines the devastating effect the attack had on a working-class family.

Lipman says the play is not about the massacre itself, but about one family and how the parents thought that because their child wasn't killed, everything would be okay.

"The event was the massacre, but there were indeed 40 students and two professors who left the room and left the women with a man who was going to kill them, and they have to live with that," she says.

The critically acclaimed play won the 2006 Enbridge playRites Award and the 2007 Governor General's Literary Award for English-Language Drama.

"It's about the trauma that this has on the survivors and [the people] close to those individuals," Lipman says. "Like for Holocaust survivors – it is still... a horror, but what still remains and will remain forever are the reverberations from the survivors, the children of the survivors and the stories. That will keep it in the eye of history, and in a sense, that is what this play is doing."

She says of her character Kathleen Fournier that because she and her husband had this child late in life, they looked at him as a blessing – a gift from God.

"She is someone who has invested everything in this child without realizing how much it is incumbent on the poor child to fulfil the dreams and go beyond. He would be the first in her family since coming to Quebec to graduate," she says. "This is something people everywhere can relate to – they want their children to have a better life than they did. She represents that kind of a person, and those feelings go beyond class, religion or nationality. She doesn't expect anything to go wrong."

The British Columbian-born Jewish actress spent her early years in Brazil, where she attended Catholic school. Her British-born father Arthur Lipman, is a financial consultant whose work took the family there. Her late mother, Lucille Kaminer, was from Toronto. She was an actress and singer who performed as Lucille Cameron.

She attended the University of British Columbia before going to the National Theatre School in Montreal, and then devoted much of her life to the theatre. More recently, she has expanded into film and television. Although she owns a home in Kingsport, N.S., she's rarely there, living most of her life out of a suitcase and gracing stages across the country.

Her life in the theatre affords her many opportunities to socialize; so when she's alone, she enjoys some solitude and pastimes including gardening. Never married and with no children, she enjoys spending time with her 94-year-old father in Vancouver when her schedule allows. Although he is not religious, she says she believes he is quite a Jewish scholar.

She herself is not religious either, but says she has a strong cultural affinity to Judaism.

Upcoming projects for Lipman include a national tour of Scorched and a new play by Joan McLeod, Another Home Invasion.

Canstage's The December Man is at the Berkeley Street Theatre until May 17. The play also stars Brian Dooley as Kathleen's husband, Benoit, and newcomer Jeff Irving as their son, Jean. It is directed by Micheline Chevrier.

Subsequently, in January 2008, the Institute for the Translation of Hebrew Literature (ITHL) compiled the professional illustrations and published Schalit's work as a children's picture book.

According to Miri Golan, an editorial assistant with the institute, the book has sold briskly in Israel and has been on Israeli "best-seller lists" since its publication.

She said all profits from the sale of the story are "dedicated to help release the three Israeli kidnapped soldiers," and that the ITHL and all the other organizations involved are volunteering their work and efforts for the cause.

Golan added that the publishers of the book are donating the profits from its sale to the Keren Maor Foundation. The foundation was set up to "co-ordinate resources to assist and advance the funding of activities and efforts made by the [kidnapped soldiers'] families in Israel" and worldwide, according to the Habanim.org website.

So far, the book has been published only in Hebrew, but Golan said it will be translated into Italian this month and that the ITHL is now "negotiating with several publishers" to translate it into English.

The emergence of the story came as a complete surprise to the Schalit family, a soft-spoken Noam Schalit said.

"We didn't remember he wrote it. We didn't recognize this side of Gilad. He was always interested in science and mathematics," he said. "We were also surprised how relevant it is for his status now. We're not sure who is the shark and who is the fish, but obviously Gilad was a peace searcher."

When asked if he has received any new information from Hamas or the Israeli government about his missing son, Schalit gave a resigned sigh and said, "Up to now there is no real progress, unfortunately. Only talking and conversations. I don't feel any real relevant details regarding progress."

Schalit said he'd held out hope that the recent visit to Israel by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter might help pry loose some communication from his son's captors, but in the end it proved a fruitless endeavour.

He specified that Carter met with him in Jerusalem last month and told the Schalits that he'd "pleaded with Hamas" to allow Gilad Schalit to release a letter to his family.

Carter told him that Hamas leaders had promised the former president they would allow a letter, but so far there has been no correspondence, he said.

Turning to the question of what the Diaspora communities could do to help his son's cause and those of the other kidnapped soldiers' families, Schalit was unsure how to respond.

"I'm not sure what the Canadian Jewish community can contribute to our struggle," he said. "But if there are any contacts of Canadians with Palestinians... especially with Hamas leaders in the Gaza Strip or Hamas' leader in Damascus [Khaled Meshal], if there is any [influence], they [should] raise this issue and exert pressure on these persons."

Still, Gilad's story has left the Schalit family hopeful that the ordeal they've been through will end happily, much like When the Shark and the Fish First Met.

Gilad Schalit begins his tale with the line, "A small and gentle fish was swimming in the middle of a peaceful ocean" when a shark appears and chases him, as sharks are wont to do.

But the fish stops mid-flight, turns to the shark and asks, "Why do you want to devour me? We can play together!"

To which the shark replies, "Okay, fine. Let's play hide and seek!" The two sea creatures swim off playfully and eventually cement their friendship over the objections of their families through sheer force of will.

Schalit concludes his story this way: "The shark said, 'You are my enemy, but maybe we can make peace?' The little fish said, 'OK.' They played secretly for days, weeks and months, until one day the shark and fish went to the fish's mother and spoke together with her... they did the same thing with the shark's mother. And from that same day, the sharks and the fish live in peace. The End."

Bahrain to name Jewish envoy

JTA

WASHINGTON — Bahrain will name a Jewish ambassador to the United States, a report said.

Huda Azar Nunu, a Jewish woman who is a lawmaker in Bahrain's upper house, will be named to the Washington position, according to a report this week in A Sharq al-Awsat, a Saudi-owned pan-Arab daily published in London.

"The sources denied that the appointment of Nunu as a woman and a Jew is a public relations campaign by Bahrain in the West, emphasizing that Huda Nunu has proven her qualifications, whether through her membership in the Consultative Council or through her work in human rights associations, of which she is an active participant in Bahrain," the newspaper said.

Bahrain, a Persian Gulf state sandwiched between Iran and Saudi Arabia, has a tiny Jewish population dating back to talmudic times. Nunu is descended from Iraqi Jews who migrated to the port of Manama in the late 19th century. Jews in Bahrain have kept a low profile but generally have been treated well.

The nation is considered among the more progressive in the region and was among the first to allow women to run for public office.

Miami shul honours Israeli tennis stars

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MIAMI — Despite all the good wishes, phone calls and handshakes that Israeli tennis players Jonathan Erlich, Shahar Peer and Andy Ram have received for their political and athletic achievements over the past year, there was one thing missing: there has been no formal presentation to honour the trio at the same time by the fans who adore them.

That changed in early April when the trio came to Miami to compete at the Sony Ericsson Open.

On the eve of the event, Erlich, Peer and Ram were all honoured at Miami's 600-member Conservative Beth David Congregation. They were also greeted by Israel's consul general in Miami, Ofer Bavly.

It has been quite a year for the three tennis stars: this past February, Peer became the first Israeli ever to play in an Arab nation, while Erlich and Ram became first Israeli tennis team to win a Grand Slam when they won the Australian Open in January.

"This is thrilling, because the ceremony is in a synagogue, and here we are all Jews – American, Israeli, South American – we all feel so together and as one," Erlich said.

"I feel so at home in Miami, because there are so many Israelis and Jewish people here to root for us. I feel good to be honoured and want to do my best for the fans," Peer said.

Peer competed in Doha, Qatar, last February, which was a significant milestone, as Israeli citizens normally can't enter an Arab nation. But tennis rules state that no tournament can discriminate against any player from entering a tournament if the player is highly ranked.

"Without a doubt, this is the biggest breakthrough in tennis since Althea Gibson [the late black American tennis champion] broke the colour barrier in the 1950s. If Althea were here, she would be very proud of what Shahar did," said Angela Buxton, Gibson's doubles partner. Buxton, the first and only Jewish woman to be a Wimbledon finalist, won the Wimbledon doubles championship with Gibson in 1956.

"I was thinking about playing in Qatar for a few years, but could not go there up until now, because I was a corporal in the Israeli armed forces. My dad really wanted me to go, as did my agent, and I felt welcome in Qatar. I had a bodyguard with me always, but felt relaxed and went out to eat with the tournament director there," Peer said.

By winning the Australian Open and the Indian Wells doubles titles since the beginning of the 2008 season, Erlich and Ram have made Israel the number one doubles team in the world, at least for now.

Other Israelis have won recognition and pride for excellence in basketball and soccer in Israel, but tennis gives Israel a global presence and glamour that no other Israeli athlete has attained. The ATP and WTA tennis tours give the three tennis pros the opportunity to be seen in large Jewish communities around the world, particularly in Canada and the United States.

"The reason to celebrate is to honour our athletes for their achievements and show the world that there is more to Israel than the conflicts and violence that we see in the news. Shahar has opened the door for more Israelis to come to Arab nations, and Andy and Jonathan's excellence in tennis means so much to everyone," Bavly said.

The trio were also honoured for leading Israel's Davis Cup and Fed Cup teams to the elite World Group this year. By contrast, Canada has never achieved this feat and lost to Israel in Fed Cup play last year.

In appreciation for being honoured, the three athletes donated tennis items to be used to raise funds for the synagogue. Erlich and Ram also set up the Jewish Sports Foundation to fund outstanding Jewish athletes and students to further their goals in sport.

"A lot of people think Jews are all rich, all doctors and lawyers, but that is not true, and it is also not true that Jews can't do well in sports," Ram said.

"For years, Americans have raised money for the Israel Tennis Centers, and now Jonathan and I created the foundation for the benefit of American kids to persue their dreams as well."

Although Peer lived up to her billing as a top player, finishing as a semi-finalist in doubles and in the top 16 in singles, Erlich and Ram lost in the opening match of the doubles tournament.

Erlich and Ram are expected to compete at the Rogers Cup men's tournament in Toronto from July 19 to 27, and Peer is scheduled to play in the Rogers Cup women's tournament in Montreal from July 26 to Aug. 3.

Inside Back

Close some other school

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

She'arim is closing. That, it seems, is just the way it is – no amount of complaints, no gathering of signatures, no last-second financial infusions will save Toronto's school for Jewish children with learning disabilities from shutting its doors at the end of this academic year. It's a tragedy for those students who would have benefited from the kind of special education that only She'arim offered in Toronto. And it's an embarrassment for Toronto's Jewish community.

Over the last few weeks, I have heard both sides of the She'arim shutdown story: A former employee of the school and an administrator at a Jewish high school in Toronto both claimed that "politics" was behind UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's decision to close She'arim (although neither gave me a particularly convincing explanation as to what those "politics" were). And I've heard, or more correctly, read, federation's point of view – specifically, in this paper.

"Despite significant community financial, educational and moral support, the board of She'arim faced mounting debts and continual dramatically dropping enrolment, and it approached federation for assistance in the fall of last year," wrote federation chair David Koschitzky in the April 10 issue of The CJN.

He went on to explain that after a joint federation-She'arim management committee was established to consider the school's future, "the clear recommendation [was] that She'arim, as it currently exists, even with continued federation financial grants, could not function financially."

"Now it's time to move forward," Koschitzky continued. "Federation's primary priority always was and always will be to help provide a sensitive, quality education for the student population served by She'arim, regardless of the higher costs involved, precisely because we consider them so important to our community."

I'll set aside the politics argument – not because I don't imagine that it might be true, but because I simply don't have any insider information – which leaves us with the federation's financial argument for closing She'arim. I don't doubt that She'arim is a financial burden on its primary funder – a school that caters to such a small demographic and that, by its very nature, must provide more comprehensive educational services than the average day or high school could never be anything but that.

And yet I question how valid the economic argument is: most, if not all, Jewish schools, we are told over and over again, bleed money every year. And if that's the case, I have to wonder, what's the harm in having one more fiscally unjustifiable school in Toronto?

Besides, if money is the issue here, I have a solution: Toronto Jews should get together and collectively decide to close one other federation-funded school, just to keep She'arim afloat. There are so many Jewish schools in this city now that finding one to close – one whose values are closely enough mimicked at another school so as to not cause too much of a problem for picky parents – shouldn't be that hard.

I personally know two former She'arim students who have gone on to complete high school and university and are currently in the middle of graduate studies – one is completing a master's degree, the other is in the middle of a PhD in clinical and forensic psychology at a U.S. school. The latter wrote to me a few weeks back, saying simply that "She'arim taught me how to learn."

That is, of course, what all schools are supposed to do – not only offer knowledge, but also help students to learn how to teach themselves.

Toronto Jews long ago came to the recognition that some children need a specialized, time- and money-consuming environment in which to learn. How pathetic that we are now willing to drop this noble cause.

OKLAHOMA BRISKET

- 1/2 c honey
- seasoned salt to taste
- 1 c apple cider
- 3 tbls soy sauce
- 1 (5 lb.) beef brisket
- seasoned salt to taste

BBQ Sauce

- 3/4 c ketchup
- 1/4 c apple cider vinegar
- 2 tbls Worcestershire sauce
- 1/4 c packed brown sugar
- seasoned salt to taste
- 1/2 tsp garlic powder

Preheat oven to 300°. Season brisket with seasoned salt; place in roasting pan. Pour over apple cider; cover tightly with aluminum foil. Roast for 3 hrs.

Prepare grill for low heat. In a small bowl, stir together honey, soy sauce and more seasoned salt. When roast comes out of the oven, place it on the preheated grill for 30 min. turning frequently and basting with honey sauce. When brisket comes off the grill, let it rest for 10 min.

In a saucepan over low heat, make barbeque sauce - combine ketchup, brown sugar, Worcestershire sauce, cider vinegar, seasoned salt, and garlic powder. Cook over low heat for 15 min. without allowing sauce to boil.

Slice brisket and serve with barbeque sauce.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

EITZ CHAIM TALMUD TORAH was planning its move from D'arcy Street to Viewmount Avenue at Bathurst Street about 1943, when a group of core supporters posed for this photograph. They are, from left, J. Goldwasser, Rabbi Jacob Wohlgelernter (principal), Sam Wortsman, Itshe Mayer Korolnek, Harry Korolnek, Rabbi Dr. David Ochs, A. Tanenbaum, unknown person, K. Goldwasser, Mrs. Sarah Salsberg and Dr. J. Kuhl. Eitz Chaim was founded in 1918, and a 90th anniversary commemoration is being planned for June.

The sixth pillar

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I watch our community and I see changes.

For decades, it has stood upon four pillars – Torah, Holocaust, Israel and fighting anti-Semitism – which have determined and shaped our decision making and programming. While the four are still the backbone of our lives, tikkun olam was added a while back as a fifth. A sixth pillar is slowly being added to our community agenda – the environment.

While Orthodox shuls are the slowest to adjust environmentally, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist synagogues/temples are going green at a respectable pace.

Torat Ha Teva is an organization promoting ecological awareness and is chaired by community activist Shai Spetgang. The organization notes, on its website, www.torathateva.org, that it has created an "inclusive and responsible" kosher food program in partnership with the First Narayever and Beth Radom congregations.

The food program includes seasonal fruit, vegetables, kosher organic meat, fish and fowl. It is a "shared option" co-op program, a way that people can buy in bulk together and save money.

The Danforth Jewish Circle, a non-denominational liberal congregation that holds its services at the Eastminster United Church, has taken the environmental challenge to the next level. Although the Danforth Jewish Circle and the church have had little interaction in the past, they are now coming together for the first-ever Danforth/Riverdale Multi-Faith Earth Day on May 4.

The event itself will be eclectic in nature, with the participation of a variety of shuls and churches. Some pretty funky stuff – artistic interpretations based on environmental and climate-change concerns – will take place. They include choir singing, dancing, storytelling, poetry readings, theatrical demonstrations and a performance by a youth group.

According to Danforth Jewish Circle member and event planner Sheila Goldgrub, the idea behind the Danforth/Riverdale Multi-Faith Earth Day event is to encourage places of worship to highlight the many concerns, challenges and creative solutions available in reference to the environment. "Our vision is to bring together the faith communities of the Danforth to explore our common humanity and role in caring for the Earth," she says.

It's interesting how the idea was born. Members of the Danforth Jewish Circle were asked, "What things keep you up at night?" The response, different from "the five pillars," was diversity, youth, aging and the environment.

In response to this call, Goldgrub and a group of congregants developed the "Green Bayit" ("house" in Hebrew) campaign, which has included selling and giving away energy-efficient light bulbs and sharing conservation tips in the shul's newsletter, as well as researching alternatives to Styrofoam cups.

The genesis of the Danforth/Riverdale Multi-Faith Earth Day came from the Green Bayit group. Group members felt the two houses of worship – Danforth Jewish Circle and Eastminster United Church – could bring their congregants together, give their membership a sense of empowerment about fixing the environment and ultimately work toward saving the environment through the arts and through their respective history and traditions.

The members of both congregations "have high hopes for this small, fragile world of ours and encourage the hopeful to join up and give Mother Earth a collective kiss," says event literature. "Protecting human health and the diversity of life is a Jewish value emphasized in the Torah, Talmud and Jewish teachings."

I led High Holy Day services at the Danforth Jewish Circle and am proud of the membership's work and character.

I encourage you to attend this event at the Eastminster United Church, 310 Danforth Ave. at Jackman Avenue, from 2:30 to 4:30 p.m. All are welcome.

WE'RE PUTTING OUR BEST HEADS TOGETHER TO STOP CANCER.

Half the renowned principal investigators at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute of Mount Sinai Hospital now focus on cancer research.

We call them our All-Star Team because each one is internationally recognized in their respective fields.

In Canada alone, 39% of women and 44% of men will develop cancer during their lifetimes and about 1 in 4 will die from it, many of them at the most productive time of their lives.

Leadership Sinai has pledged to raise $3 million to enable our All-Star Team to investigate the limits of cancer and help prevent it.

Standing in the fore of Jewish history

Judging by his appearance in the accompanying archival photo, it does not seem that David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, had much occasion or experience wearing, let alone fashioning, a formal dress tie. However, nor did it appear that the sure-sighted, steely-eyed visionary much cared, either.

His heart, his soul and all his strength had been focused for many years on far weightier matters: securing and building a national homeland for the Jewish people.

Standing beside the prime minister is Chaim Weizmann, the legendary first president of the Jewish state. Beside Weizmann, who was nearly blind at this stage in his life, is the country's first chief of staff, Yigael Yadin, a man who would ultimately become known as much for his eye-opening archeology as for his courage and bravery in battle.

The three men are standing in the fore on the dais for a military review in Jerusalem. Indeed, they are standing in the fore of Jewish history itself, celebrating Israel's second year of free, independent existence as a sovereign Jewish state.

The date was the fifth day of Iyar, 1950. O what a great and glorious day it was! This week on the fifth day of Iyar, we celebrate Israel's 60th anniversary. O what a great and glorious day it is.

Some 18 months prior to that military review in Jerusalem, fighting had stopped in what historians called Israel's War of Independence. The nascent Jewish state had withstood the onslaught of the five armies of the neighbouring Arab states along with, of course, the local irregular Arab forces who fought under the command of various absentee warlords, landowners and tribal chiefs.

Some 600,000 people – among whom were many tortured, starved and abused souls who had not long ago landed on Israel's shores from the death camps of Europe – stood against the military strength of the 45 million people of those five Arab states.

NDP Motion Praised

WINNIPEG — B'nai Brith last week praised Manitoba's NDP government for marking the week of Yom Hashoah by backing a resolution in the legislature that condemns "without reservation" any Holocaust denial. "We look to other provinces to follow Manitoba's example and to engage constructively in educational programs that teach about the Holocaust and the importance of combating racism," said B'nai Brith spokesperson Frank Diamant. The motion passed unanimously.

Cemetery Vandalized

BERLIN — Vandals attacked Europe's largest Jewish cemetery twice last week, Berlin police said. Some 20 gravestones and 10 stones from a nearby wall were found overturned April 30 in Berlin's Weissensee Cemetery in what police called a politically motivated crime. Graves in another section of the cemetery were found ravaged the previous day. The graveyard in the former East Berlin was dedicated in 1880 and is still in use. A national historical monument, the 115,000-grave site has been subject to vandalism in recent years.

Student Charged

GRAND FORKS, N.D. — A student was charged in an incident that helped drive a Jewish freshman from his dorm. Spencer Garness, who allegedly wrote "Scott is a Jew" in a residence elevator at the University of North Dakota, was charged April 29 with disorderly conduct, which could lead to 30 days in jail and a $1,000 fine. Freshman Scott Lebovitz said it was one of a series of anti-Semitic acts that led him to leave his dorm this month. Students had taunted him for months, and in February, a swastika was found on a wall by his room.

'Al Nakba' Recalled

NEW YORK — Arab student groups at Columbia University last week marked the 60th anniversary of Israel's founding, which Arabs call "the catastrophe." Events included hanging 2,000 posters, each marked with the name of a destroyed Palestinian village, and a faculty discussion with anthropology professor Nadia Abu El-Haj and Prof. Joseph Massad, whom Jewish students have accused of harassment.

Rabbis Urge Boycott

NEW YORK — Leading Jewish rabbis and lay leaders are urging Jewish tourists not to attend the Beijing Olympics. More than 175 people, including the heads of Reform and Conservative Judaism, signed the April 30 appeal. It was initiated by two New York Orthodox rabbis, Haskell Lookstein and Irving Greenberg, after they learned China set up a kosher kitchen for Jewish tourists. "We are deeply troubled by China's support for the genocidal government of Sudan, its mistreatment of the people of Tibet, its denial of basic rights to its own citizens, and its provision of missiles to Iran and Syria, and friendship for Hamas," the statement said.

Clinton Irks Iran

NEW YORK — Iran lodged a complaint at the United Nations over Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton's threat to destroy Iran if it attacked Israel with nuclear weapons. Iran's deputy ambassador to the UN blasted Clinton in a letter to Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, saying she made a "provocative, unwarranted and irresponsible statement."

Yad Vashem Photo Archive Goes Online

JERUSALEM — Marking Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Day on May 1, Yad Vashem last week uploaded its photo archives to www.yadvashem.org.

Some 130,000 images were uploaded from the collection, the largest of its kind in the world. They include photos from ghettos and deportations, as well as images of slave labour, the camps, liberation and more. Many are being made public for the first time.

Users can search the database by topic, name or location. Photos are linked to information on their content, and when users click on an image, a map opens that shows the location of places cited in the photo's caption. Other links enable expanded searches.

"We are hoping that it will increase public awareness of the archives' tremendous importance, and encourage people who have similar photographs and documents to confer them to Yad Vashem for safekeeping," said Avner Shalev, chairman of Yad Vashem.

'Our joy is always connected to tears'

Consul general reflects on Yom Hazikaron, Yom Ha'atzmaut

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Sitting in his Toronto office last week, Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, was asked to reflect on both his mood and the mood of Israelis as the state approaches its 60th birthday.

What emerged from a 45-minute interview with Gissin – freshly returned from a hectic family Passover in Israel – were the thoughts of a man deeply cognizant of his responsibility as an envoy, a Jew, and an Israeli citizen.

Gissin said Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut are particularly significant to his family, as they are to most Israelis.

His family has lost six members who died defending the state over the years, including a cousin who died last year while serving during his reserve duty in a Gaza military operation, he said.

"It's part of life in Israel," Gissin said, heaviness imparted in his words. "Whoever you are, you know people who were killed as soldiers or civilians in terrorist attacks. Living in Israel, on Yom Hazikaron, that's the time you feel connected to your personal sorrow… and to Israelis in general."

He said it's difficult for Diaspora Jews who have never experienced the holiday in Israel to understand the emotion and respect that emanate from citizens when sirens blow across the country on that day, signalling a moment of silence in honour of the dead.

Amir Gissin

But despite the burdensome air that permeates Yom Hazikaron in the country, Gissin said the decision to place the day immediately prior to the celebratory Yom Ha'atzmaut is one he wouldn't change.

"It's almost impossible to move from great sorrow to great joy," he noted, adding that the swift transition from Yom Hazikaron to Yom Ha'atzmaut "reflects the fact that [Israel's] existence is based on the price others paid and reflects a very fundamental truth about Israel: that our joy is always connected to tears. It's a true reflection of the Israeli psyche."

For Gissin, it's not the same celebrating these holidays in Canada as it is in Israel, because here "the world and society goes on its regular way," he said.

"It demonstrates a cultural difference between Israelis and Canadians, which is very interesting. The sense of paying a price to defend a country is not as strong here."

Still, Gissin said he has "a lot of empathy" for Canadian Jewry because they're in a unique situation.

"They live in both worlds. They are proud Canadians, but they also see Israel [as] dear to their hearts and are saddened as well with our losses," he said. "It gives me great comfort to know that I am among a community which… is able to share the sorrow and strong sense of commitment that we as Israelis have towards our country."

Join us for this exciting and unique evening!

BEIT HALOCHEM CANADA'S "Celebration of Life" Concert presents stories of true heroism, strength of will and determination depicting 60 years of Israel's history. Together with a talented international trio of singers and wheelchair dancers, renowned Israeli director Roni Aviram brings to Canada his expertise and vision through a creative multimedia production that will reflect the diversity of Israeli culture and society. This concert will surely captivate you as our performers illuminate the stage.

Among the Heroes we will honour …

Amit Bar'el had been a systems administrator when he was called to the reserves to join his comrades during the Second Lebanon War. Amit was struck by an anti-tank missile, was severely wounded in the head and lost his eyesight. His greatest regret is that he will no longer be able to see his two daughters.

Guy Prais was on a routine patrol mission in the West Bank in 2002 when terrorists attacked and exploded the vehicle in which he was traveling. He lost his legs in the ambush at 21 years of age. Today, Guy is walking, sailing, swimming and skiing — a true inspiration to us all.

Anna Krakovich was at the Afula central bus station when a terrorist blew himself up, killing many and wounding dozens. She has traveled a difficult road in her new life, struggling with 80% burns over her body. Anna's positive outlook and her young daughter inspire her to walk proudly with her head held high.

An unforgettable moment

From the editor's desk

Certain moments in life travel to memory in the whispered softnesses of a sad sigh. They catch in the throat. They tear in the eye.

And then they remain forever near our hearts, part of the sum of our private, inner selves, a reminder both of life's bitter evanescence and of the precious infinity of every human life.

Last week in Ottawa on May 1, on the very steps of the Peace Tower on Parliament Hill, a small group of survivors and members of their families experienced such a moment.

They were invited by the Parliament of Canada and by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem to participate in, now the fifth, annual Holocaust Remembrance Day ceremony.

Each survivor, accompanied by a Canadian parliamentarian, and in many cases as well, by one or two generations of members of their respective families, placed a wreath of remembrance upon the steps leading to the high promontory of the peace tower.

Some were hobbled more than others by age or infirmity. They walked more slowly. But all walked to the place of memorial with significant urgency and purpose in their step, especially those who were also in the tight embrace of their children and grandchildren.

Highly charged and closely felt emotions wafted in the crisp air as plainly as the white gray ribbons of constantly moving clouds.

Richard Marceau, the Bloc Québécois member of parliament who was widely credited as being the initiator of the annual parliamentary Holocaust remembrance, was among the first to address the large assembly.

In touching, respectful words that soared as high as the sound of the bells pealing every quarter hour from the Peace Tower behind him, he acknowledged with gentle, touching deference the presence of the survivors at the ceremony. Indeed all the speakers did so. They well understood that profound humility is really the only appropriate personal comportment in the company of the remaining survivor few.

Pointing to the fact of the very holding of the ceremony, Rabbi Reuben Bulka, the co-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, suggested that "Canada has learned the lesson of the Shoah," namely that we must teach our children and our people and the peoples of the world of the horrors of all forms of racism and genocide.

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, conveyed a stirring, emotional statement of gratitude on behalf of the people and government of Israel.

"We are quite moved that Canada and the Parliament of Canada hold this commemoration each year."

The two survivors who addressed the audience, Joseph Gottdenker and David Azrieli, reiterated this very special message of gratitude and thanks to the Parliament, and thus, too, to the Canadian people.

"This place, Parliament Hill, is the place of freedom," Azrieli eloquently pointed out. "We give special thanks to Canada" he said.

Though the emotions and the tears ran exclusively for the men, women and children murdered in Hitler's Shoah, the linkage to present dangers was unavoidable. If "never again" is to mean anything, many speakers pointed out, it must mean "never again" today and always against every genocide and attempted genocide. And it must certainly be the rallying cry in response to the enemies of Israel who declare their genocidal intentions against the Jewish state.

Thus, Marceau also made a special effort to tie the moment of Holocaust remembrance to one of Holocaust avoidance.

Referring to the threats uttered by the government of Iran, he urged Canada, Canadians and the West to "take the right stand, to take the moral stand" to prevent the Iranians from achieving their desire to "wipe Israel off the map."

As if in response to Marceau's unambiguous challenge to the world, Israeli Baker promised, "We will not allow such a crime to reoccur."

The bells of the tower pealed at that very instant.

As the end of the program approached, with the sun falling farther in the west, the breeze grew stronger. Eighteen official ceremonial flags – 17 Canadian, one Magen David – snapped sharply in the wind.

The Netivot Hatorah Choir from Toronto and Cantor David Aptowitzer of Ottawa sang the tearfully inspiring Partisan's Song, Zog Nit Keinmol (Never Say That We Have Walked Our Last Road). The effect was chilling to the spine, yet sustaining to the soul. Defiance, hope, sadness and gratitude.

It was one of those rare moments that will never be forgotten.

CIJA blocked from Durban II

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Council on Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) has withdrawn its application for accreditation to the upcoming Durban Review Conference, also known as Durban II.

Hershell Ezrin

CIJA was blocked by the discriminatory treatment of Iran and its supporters at the UN, whose goal was "to marginalize Jewish voices and memory," said Hershell Ezrin, chief executive officer of CIJA.

"The whole process had become so discriminatory to us, we felt that no matter how many times we answered their questions and responded to shorter and shorter deadlines, we were asked the same questions over and over again," he said.

Durban II is the followup to the 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism, held in Durban, South Africa, which critics said degenerated into an anti-Israel and anti-Semitic hatefest.

CIJA applied for accreditation to Durban II in 2007 and was approved by the UN Secretariat. About two months ago, the office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (UNHCHR) informed CIJA that Iran objected to its inclusion as a recognized NGO, although no reasons were given.

Under the UN's rules, details of the objection were supposed to have been communicated to CIJA for a response, but CIJA was given no concrete reasons for its exclusion before the Durban preparatory committee met on April 21, the second day of Passover.

CIJA's application was discussed that day, and the organization was given 48 hours to provide information to Iran. During a second debate on April 28, Iran demanded further documentation, and CIJA was given 24 hours to reply. In all, CIJA provided more than 100 pages of documentation to support its application.

CIJA withdrew its application when it became clear it could never convince Iran to withdraw its objections. Since the preparatory committee operates by consensus, it was inevitable that CIJA's application would be rejected, Ezrin said.

Iran was supported by Egypt, Algeria and the Palestinian delegation, while Argentina, speaking on behalf of South American nations, as well as Switzerland and Slovenia, representing the European Union, supported CIJA.

"It is unacceptable that the accreditation process be dominated by political considerations. We need to ensure that the process be fair, respectful and transparent," the Slovenian delegate stated on behalf of the EU.

In a letter to the UNHCHR announcing its withdrawal, CIJA said "the continuing and obvious actions by a group of member states led by Iran appear to us to be aimed primarily at marginalizing Jewish voices and memory. They remain at odds with the UN's high ideals."

"Despite the anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist hate that blighted and derailed the initial Durban conference [Durban I], there remained hope that, working together, people of goodwill could identify common ground in the fight against racism, discrimination and xenophobia. However, the events of recent days have put into question again the will, or ability, to fix the broken Durban process. While initially we felt it important to defend our name and reputation, it is now clear that, no matter what evidence we supply to demonstrate our bona fides, or how many times we supply it, under how many shrinking deadlines, it will make no difference in affecting the agenda of Iran or its supporters."

Hillel Neuer

Anne Bayefsky, senior editor of the watchdog Eye On The UN website, said CIJA's treatment "was clearly a case of double standards applied to a Jewish and pro-Israel organization."

Bayefsky, who was in Geneva monitoring the Durban II preparatory conference, said "there is no doubt they [CIJA] were treated differently from all other NGO applications, and the Iranians were given virtually carte blanche to interrupt the accreditation process."

Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, a human rights monitoring group, said, "It is ironic that a UN gathering to combat racism became a platform for Tehran's fundamentalist regime and its allies to single out and harass a mainstream NGO for no apparent reason other than the inclusion in its name of the words Jewish and Israel. All of this from a Holocaust-denying government that was just censured by the UN General Assembly for its persecution of religious and racial minorities."

They have everything to do with a risk-averse investment approach and an unwavering commitment to producing steady returns to investors. Together, these form the foundation of the continued success and growth of the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund (RMIF or Fund).

RMIF is an income fund managed by Romspen Investment Corporation (RIC), a company characterized by years of experience, demonstrated results, and a disciplined lending strategy that has succeeded, even in economic downturns and recessions. The Fund provides financing for commercial real estate across Canada, 94% of which is secured by first mortgages. It is well-positioned to capitalize on the opportunities presented by the current credit crunch. As traditional financial institutions continue to curtail their lending activities, the Fund can provide high quality borrowers with the financing they need, while still maintaining a low loan-to-value ratio.

The Fund manager, RIC, has produced impressive results. The RMIF has never experienced a losing month. It has consistently delivered solid returns. Since inception, the annualized return to investors has been 9.9%.

Such superior results inspire confidence – in the Fund, in its manager, and in its investment philosophy – and that confidence is driving our growth. In the past 6 months, new investment in the RMIF has averaged in excess of $10 million per month. A great deal of this growth has come from within. Many existing investors are not only increasing their own investments but are also recommending RMIF to their family and friends.

The RMIF is designed to generate a regular monthly income stream while protecting assets from market fluctuation. Therefore the Fund is particularly appropriate for investors who are retired or are planning their retirement. The income earned through the Fund is distributed on a monthly basis, with direct deposit made into each investor's bank account on the 15th of every month. The Fund is also RRSP and RRIF eligible.

Let us rejoice

In the words of the United Kingdom's chief rabbi, Sir Jonathan Sacks, "after almost 2,000 years of homelessness, the Jewish people had come home."

"It is a story without parallel in history," the chief rabbi tells us in his magnificently conceived double CD, Israel Home of Hope.

And it is a story that deserves to be celebrated loud, clear and proud in the hearts of all humanity. For as Rabbi Sacks also tells us, "Israel's existence and achievements are living testimony to one of Judaism's greatest messages to humankind: the principled defeat of tragedy by the power of hope."

Yet many are the people today with malice in their hearts toward the Jewish state who distort the story, revise it, who try to sever the present and ancient tie between the Jewish people and the land of Israel.

Editors, commentators and reporters of print and television slyly suggest that the Jewish state will not survive into the future. Teachers and academics organize boycotts of their Israeli counterparts. Union leaders line up their membership behind Israel's enemies to join in the calumny against the Jewish state. Even anthropologists cast doubt on the work of Israeli archeologists, accusing them of subordinating science to nationalism. But no amount of distortion and falsification can win out against the truth that is the irreducible centre of a faith, and indeed of a civilization.

As Rabbi Sacks says: "Judaism was born in the hope of a land. Israel is the Jewish land of hope."

There are 82 Christian nations on earth and 56 Muslim ones. Israel occupies less than one-quarter of one per cent of the entire land mass of the Arab world. The Jews are begrudged even this tiny sliver of land, even though time and again, they have shown – as they do even today – the willingness to share it with the Palestinians and even though time and again, they have fought for it and died for it and won the right to call it home.

The Jews in Israel are not colonialists, usurpers or occupiers. They are home in the land of their forebears, in the land that is at the centre of the Jewish faith and the Jewish soul.

As Ben-Gurion, Weizmann and Yadin did on Israel's second anniversary, we too, metaphorically at least, must all stand this week on the dais of celebration. We must sing, dance, laugh, tell stories, recite poetry. We must raise a glass in unabashed happiness. We must remember the generations who could only dream of a sovereign Jewish state. We must hug our children and tell them with unequalled delight and everlasting love that we are privileged to live in a day and an age alongside the Jewish State of Israel.

The 60th anniversary of Israel's independence "is a day that God has made. Let us be glad and rejoice in it."

Am Yisrael Chai.

Rabbi Gilbert Klaperman, president of the Rabbinical Council of America, announced the establishment of a commission to study the "feasibility, desirability and halachic implications" of maintaining a relationship with the Reform movement. The move came after Reform's Central Conference of American Rabbis accepted patrilineal descent as a method for defining who is a Jew.

From the Prime Minister

It is with great pleasure that I extend my warmest greetings to the Jewish community in Canada as you celebrate the 60th anniversary of the State of Israel.

Since its formation in 1948, Israel has grown in strength and stature. "The Miracle in the Desert" transformed an arid Mediterranean plain into an abundant and productive landscape. The Jewish people built a nation of freedom and peace with perseverance and enduring faith. Israel's very existence is a testament to the spirit of its people and the power of hope.

As fellow Canadians, we can all take pride in the pivotal role Canada played in crafting the United Nations resolution that led to this defining moment in history. Through six decades of triumph and tragedy, Canada has been a stalwart friend to Israel, and we will continue to stand together to realize the goal of freedom, democracy, human rights and rule of law for all people in the region.

On behalf of the government of Canada, please accept my best wishes for a memorable and enjoyable celebration.

Stephen Harper

Withdraw financial support to universities

At the University of Toronto, at York University, at McMaster University and at the University of Western Ontario, there has been a flagrant exercise of anti-Semitic propaganda in the guise of free speech rights ("Students, faculty mobilize on campus," CJN, April 17). Specifically, it takes the form of "Israeli Apartheid Week" or "Students against Israeli Apartheid." The use of the "apartheid" term is patently false. It is contrived and knowingly intended to delegitimize the Jewish state. I would remind all that it was the votes of five Arab members of the Knesset that gave former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin the necessary 61 votes to pass those Oslo accords that rescued former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, who was in disgrace over his support of Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait.

We must act now, in order to make the universities pay attention to our concerns, or more accurately, our revulsion. Here's what I intend to do.

• U of T is in its annual charity campaign. I am telling the caller that I will not donate any amount.
• I make it clear that the reason I reject their request for donation is because I cannot support an institution that permits the blatant practise of anti-Semitism, which undoubtedly is what the "apartheid" campaign signifies.
• I will donate the money that would have gone to U of T to an Israeli charity.
• When I am approached by any of the other universities for money, I will repeat this practice.
• I intend to use the Internet to spread this message, and I invite others to do the same.

If enough small donors act in this way, it is bound to have an impact. I invite all donors, big and small, to protest this unconscionable proliferation of anti-Semitism on university campuses by withdrawing their financial support from these institutions.

Germany's motives for friendship

Deservedly, in my opinion, Yoni Goldstein's cynical view of Germany's motives for its expressions of friendship and support of Israel appears on the penultimate page of your April 3 Toronto issue ("Israel's 'special' friend"). At a time when there is no shortage of international animosity toward the country, do we really need to slap our friends in the face? As an 83-year-old former German Jew who had the fortune to escape from Germany in 1937 but who lost a number of family members and friends in the Shoah, I think it is time to accept that the majority of Germans and their government sincerely believe in the justice of Israel's existence (as well as in that of a Palestinian state) and and have the guts to voice their support. Yes, there are anti-Semites in Germany, as elsewhere, but I also know of a number of continuing efforts by individual Germans to ensure that the crimes of 1933 to 1945 perpetrated by the forebears are not forgotten. They do not do this in order to "bolster Germany's place in the world."

B'nai Brith expulsion

I recently learned of Lou Ronson's expulsion from B'nai Brith Canada ("B'nai Brith expels members for 'conduct unbecoming,'" CJN, March 6). When an organization expels one of its oldest and most distinguished members, what remains of the organization? It was ironic that he was prohibited from entering the B'nai Brith building when he would have been an honoured guest at other Jewish and social justice institutions. Someone should have had the courage to sign Ronson's expulsion letter, but then again, who would want to tarnish their name by signing such a document – certainly no one at B'nai Brith Canada headquarters.

Since its creation 60 years ago, more than three million people have immigrated to Israel from virtually every part of the globe. This massive movement of humanity to the Jewish state is a fulfilment of the eternal yearning of the Jewish people, as embodied in our age-old prayers, to be "gathered together from the four corners of the earth."

That millennial aspiration was enshrined into Israel's Declaration of Independence.

"Survivors of the Nazi holocaust in Europe, as well as Jews from other parts of the world, continued to migrate to Eretz-Israel, undaunted by difficulties, restrictions and dangers, and never ceased to assert their right to a life of dignity, freedom and honest toil in their national homeland…

"THE STATE OF ISRAEL will be open for Jewish immigration and for the Ingathering of the Exiles; it will foster the development of the country for the benefit of all its inhabitants; it will be based on freedom, justice and peace as envisaged by the prophets of Israel; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture; it will safeguard the Holy Places of all religions; and it will be faithful to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

Opinions

They weren't animals

A mother getting on a train to Treblinka leaves her baby on the ground, hoping a stranger will save her. Franciszek Zabeki writes what happened next:

"In no time, an SS man ran up… seized the child by its feet, and smashed its head against a wheel of the wagon. This took place in full view of the mother, who was howling with pain."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

How do you describe someone who takes joy in splitting open a baby's head? It would seem natural to call the Nazis "animals." But it would also be wrong.

Animals are instinctive beings that can't be held responsible for their actions. The brutal murderers of the death camps, while inhumane, were still human beings. Unlike animals, the Nazis had free will.

Free will is an intimidating idea. Maimonides sharply opposed astrology (a respectable discipline at the time), because the belief in a future that's already decided negates free will. But astrology is popular precisely because it's much easier to see our destinies as controlled by the stars than to accept responsibility for our own actions.

In the 12th century, astrology could explain our failures. And as science has progressed, excuses have become more sophisticated. Criminals have claimed diminished capacity due to the psychotropic effects of eating Twinkies or MSG. Soon, DNA tests and CAT scans will exonerate criminals from responsibility. A clever defence attorney might craft similar arguments to prove the Nazis were animals and had no free will.

But the Nazis were normal human beings, and we have the pictures to prove it. A photo album compiled by SS officer Karl Hocker shows the leisure activities of the SS at Auschwitz. They kick back at a country resort, socializing and holding sing-alongs. In a moment of holiday spirituality, they painstakingly decorate a Christmas tree.

Viewing pictures of Hocker playing with his dog, I felt a twinge of empathy for him. He didn't very seem different from me at all. Of course, had a time machine dropped me into that same photograph, Hocker wouldn't have hesitated to shoot me dead. This regular, dog-loving guy was a genocidal murderer.

Yes, the Nazis were regular guys who cried at funerals and laughed at jokes. However, they made horrific choices. These average Joes chose to be genocidal murderers.

The idea that all of us are only one bad choice away from being as evil as the Nazis is a sobering thought. But the burden of personal responsibility means we must be ever vigilant in our pursuit of virtue and remember that we can't blame our mistakes on the stars, or on Twinkies.

We must focus on people, not buildings

In mid-April, just before Jews celebrated our great moment of national liberation by doing what we do best – learning, reading, arguing, praying, singing and eating – the Montreal Jewish community launched a great effort at communal liberation.

Federation CJA is spearheading "Gen J," an ambitious campaign to invest heavily in education and identity-building. Without such a massive recommitment to creating exciting, meaningful Jewish experiences, we can't guarantee that our children and grandchildren will have the same kinds of seders that our parents and grandparents enjoyed.

Gil Troy in Montreal

North American Jews risk being cursed by our blessings. In two of the freest, richest and most welcoming countries on earth, the United States and Canada, Jews have thrived individually and communally. We have redefined life on this continent with our remarkable successes, meshing some of our core values with essential democratic and capitalist values.

But the embrace can be smothering. The more we mix, and the more American and Canadian we become, the harder it is to retain a distinct, rich Jewish identity.

Rather than surrendering and watching the community wither, we must try harder. We should be Jewishly ambitious, as thirsty for success in our Jewish lives as we are in our careers. We should demand as much excellence from our Jewish institutions as we – and others – expect in our professions and cultural institutions. And we must maintain the creative tension, seeking newer and hipper and savvier approaches that enhance traditional ideas and preserve eternal values, rather than undermining or demeaning them.

The initiative began with some parents (full disclosure: including my wife and me) who were disturbed that every year, approximately 100 Jewish students are choosing not to enter Jewish high schools after graduating from Montreal's Jewish elementary schools, with many parents choosing to double their tuition bills at non-Jewish private schools.

While appreciating our community's strengths, we were dismayed by the constant complaints about many of our educational, cultural and spiritual institutions. We didn't understand why successful programs such as Birthright Israel and March of the Living didn't always have successful follow-up programs. And many of us were frankly bored by some of the mediocre Jewish experiences that were being imposed on us again and again.

We began meeting informally at kitchen tables. We tapped into a conversation among other lay people and professionals that had stopped and started over the last decade. And we found visionary CJA leaders who were ready to push the idea of a communal revolution even further than we had ever imagined.

This ambitious, community-wide approach will need to raise at least $100 million over the next decade. To succeed, it will have to tap into the power and shift the priorities of existing institutions such as the Jewish Community Foundation, as well as mobilize traditional leadership families and uncover a new generation of path-breaking movers, shakers and givers.

Rather than mimicking many Jewish communities with their "edifice complexes" – investing so much money building buildings, then scrambling to fill them – most of this money will be invested in programs and tuition subsidies – into sharpening minds, elevating souls, and stretching us as Jews and as human beings.

The initiative identifies five gateways leading to better Jewish living: formal Jewish education; camps and youth programming; family and adult programming; Israel experiences; and arts and culture. The idea is to focus less on hardware and more on updating communal software, trying to reach Jews at all stages of the life-cycle, but especially Jewish youth.

To be frank, for this to work, the tectonic plates must shift even further. In addition to investing money and generating creative ideas, we must train a new generation of lay leaders, administrators, teachers and informal educators who are nimble, passionate, visionary and cutting-edge.

We will have to treat our educators – and those who are educationally minded – with greater respect, as people with the whole world – our future – in their hands.

In a great example of the role-modelling and personal leadership we need to see, Federation CJA's talented executive vice-president, Danyael Cantor, will become the executive director of Montreal's Bronfman Jewish Education Centre. In taking on this new task, Cantor will be one of the architects responsible for designing a future education and identity-building system that, with everyone's generosity and creativity, will once again be the gold standard for meaningful North American Jewish living.

Special wishes on a special birthday

At a restaurant serving Israeli fare in the northern reaches of the Greater Toronto Area, customers' birthdays are celebrated by dimming the lights and, as a dessert with a candle is brought forward, playing a recording of the Israeli birthday song Hayom yom huledet (Today is the Birthday).

The song, familiar to anyone who has attended a birthday party in an Israeli gan or school, is intended to be personalized for each celebrant. It begins like this: "Hayom yom huledet, hayom yom huledet, hayom yom huledet le- _____" (and here one inserts the name of the birthday boy or girl).

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

The recording at the restaurant, of course, can't be varied to incorporate the name of the birthday celebrant. It's fixed on one name – in this case, Itamar. So whenever someone marks a birthday there, no matter what the child's name is – and on some days, there are several birthday children (or children at heart) – the lights go down and patrons are treated to a rousing "Hayom yom huledet le'Itamar." After a few renditions, you're not likely to forget the song.

As Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day, approaches, the tune spins maddeningly and inappropriately in my head. Maddeningly, because it's not, after all Mozart, and inappropriately, because Israel, at 60, is no longer a child among the nations.

The task of designing appropriate ways to mark this special year has fallen to those more experienced, qualified and talented than me. Still, it seems to me that each of us who feel specially connected to the country, the place, the dream and the reality of the modern State of Israel need to also find small, personal ways to mark this significant anniversary.

Recently, I was privileged to celebrate my mother-in-law's milestone birthday with her. The delicacy of convention prevents me from citing a specific year number. In honour of the occasion, the Governor General of Canada congratulated her on her "rich life, filled with accomplishments, personal encounters, happiness and challenges."

Taking a page from the Governor General's birthday wishes, I began to think of personal and private ways to mark the 60th birthday of Israel, a country whose childhood enthusiasms have given way to the richness of adult accomplishments, celebrations and challenges.

Our tradition tells us, "Ben shishim la-ziknah" – at 60, one enters old age. Of course, ziknah – old age – implies something more than chronological status. It's a stage when one commands respect – for experience, wisdom and judgment.

But Israel's 60 is not the 60 of ziknah. I don't mean that 60 is the new 50 or 40, or whatever. I mean that country years are not people years. At seven, my Portuguese water dog has entered midlife (although she is as spirited as a puppy). At 60, Israel is still at the peak of its strength (although it has flashes of the enthusiasm of childhood and intimations of the wisdom of ziknah).

At 60, Israel's creative energies are flowing, with a plethora of creative writers, poets, filmmakers and artists, and a booming Silicon Wadi that leads the world's high-tech industry. As a spiritual wellspring for different branches of, and approaches to, Judaism, at 60, Israel has been a fertile home for religious development, experiment and fulfilment. At 60, Israel has facilitated the evolution of secular and national forms of Jewishness. And, at 60, Israel has touched profoundly those who open themselves up to its embrace.

At 60, Israel faces difficult challenges – some common to most industrialized countries with diverse populations, and some particular to Israel's special history and geography. We who celebrate this significant milestone birthday must also give serious thoughts to those challenges.

But just as birthday parties for friends and loved ones are not the time to trot out problems to be tackled and issues to be resolved, so, too, Israel is entitled, on its birthday, to revel in our recognition of what it has attained.

In wishing my mother-in-law the fulfilment of her most dearly held dreams, the Governor General concluded her birthday letter with the hope that "all your friends and loved ones revel in your happiness."

In the same spirit, on Israel's 60th, I offer one wish, one dream: Shalom. Peace.

Nowhere are such dreams as pure as in childhood. So why not, then, sing that children's birthday song?

The Kirshner File

Israel at 60: rooted in hope, steeled in adversity

Naftali Hertz Imber (1856-1909), a Galician poet who penned the lyrics of what would be Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah, wrote the following lines in the late 19th century, when Palestine was an Ottoman backwater inhabited by some 450,000 Arabs and 25,000 Jews: If you long to inherit the land of your birth/ Buckle up the sword and take up the bow.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It was a call to arms, a clear-eyed recognition that the return of Jews to their ancestral land – which they ruled, on and off, for 13 centuries amid conquests by the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Crusaders and Arabs – would not be accomplished through fancy flights of rhetoric, much less peaceful accommodation with their suspicious Muslim and Christian neighbours.

Israel, which this week marks its 60th anniversary of statehood, has lived by the sword from the outset, ever since five Arab armies invaded after David Ben-Gurion, the first prime minister, declared independence on May 14, 1948, a day before the British mandate expired.

Israel, which emerged only three years after the liberation of the Auschwitz concentration camp and the cold-blooded murder of six million European Jews in the Holocaust, fought back ferociously, fending off a concerted attempt by Egypt, Syria, Transjordan, Lebanon and Saudi Arabia to throttle it at birth.

But Israel's victory in the War of Independence, expected by few foreign strategists, came at a heavy price. More than 6,000 combatants and civilians, or almost one per cent of Israel's population, were killed. And all but 160,000 Arabs were uprooted from their homes in 400 villages and towns, creating a festering Palestinian refugee problem.

Since then, Israel – the fulfillment of messianic yearnings and Zionist spadework spearheaded by, among others, Theodor Herzl – has been at war. Even after armistice agreements were signed with all but one of the Arab states that tried to destroy it, Israel was again fending off attacks from Syria and Palestinian fedayeen.

And so it has gone ever since, notwithstanding peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan and the abortive Oslo peace process with the Palestinians. Still the world's only nation whose existence is challenged and whose survival cannot be taken for granted, Israel has waged a succession of wars since 1949: the 1956 Suez War, the 1967 Six Day War (which gave Israel a false sense of security, launched its settlement building drive, branded it as an occupying power and burdened it with a still unresolved demographic problem), the 1968-70 War of Attrition, the1973 Yom Kippur War, and two wars (1982 and 2006) and countless operations in Lebanon.

In total, more than 20,000 Israelis have been killed fighting for Israel, making it the world's least safe country for Jews in terms of violent deaths.

And now, following its 2005 unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, Israel is at war with Hamas, a radical Palestinian movement whose undisguised goal is to extinguish Israel and create an Islamic state within the historic borders of Palestine. In addition, Israel faces possible threats from Hezbollah, Syria and Iran, whose fiery president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has repeatedly called for its destruction as he pushes ahead with plans to establish a nuclear arsenal. So, although Israel is a regional power with the strongest armed forces in the Middle East, backed up by an undeclared nuclear deterrent and the friendship and support of the United States, Israel cannot rest easily.

Israel remains painfully vulnerable, having been subjected to suicide bombing campaigns and bombarded by nearly 4,000 Hezbollah rockets in the Second Lebanon War, 39 Iraqi Scud missiles in the 1991 Gulf War and approximately 7,000 Qassam rockets and mortars since the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in 2001. Yet Israel – whose population has reached 7.2 million, of whom 75.8 per cent are Jews – has managed not only to survive in a generally hostile environment, but to thrive as a prosperous Western-style democracy in an area rife with dictatorships and torn by bitter sectarian divisions. Indeed, Israel's parliamentary system is so freewheeling and raucous that an outright majority government has never been formed.

Nevertheless, many Israelis are disillusioned with the conduct of their leaders and speak glumly of a leadership crisis. The current prime minister Ehud Olmert, a slick and canny politician who was tarred by the inconclusive outcome of the last war in Lebanon, faces police and judicial investigations. Several cabinet ministers, from Tzachi Hannegbi to Avraham Hirschon, have had to resign in disgrace. When the deputy prime minister, Haim Ramon, was justice minister, he was forced to take a leave of absence after being accused of sexual harassment. The former president, Moshe Katsav, had to step down in ignominy after several women claimed he had assaulted and raped them.

At 60, Israel's hi-tech, free market economy is booming, despite bouts with recession, hyper-inflation and high unemployment. Until the Six Day War, a turning point in its history, Israel was a socialist bastion characterized by austerity and simplicity. The Histadrut labour union wielded immense influence, the kibbutz was a model of communal living, the Egged bus driver was king, and foreign travel and private cars were prohibitively expensive, far beyond the reach of most Israelis. But those days have vanished under the impact of economic reforms and globalization.

Today, Israel is a mini America with an amazingly vibrant culture whose annual medium household income of $37,000 places it ahead of Britain but behind Australia and Canada. Israelis are avid, sometimes crass consumers, and the expectations of its middle-class are rising.

Israel has a corps of 7,200 millionaires, and the richest 19 families control one-third of the economy. Real estate values have skyrocketed, and recently, a high-flying businessman paid $17.1 million for a flat in Tel Aviv, and two months ago, a triplex of 1,500 square metres, with a 360-degree panoramic view of the city, was put up for sale for $34 million.

Amid such wealth, 1.6 million Israelis, or a quarter of the population, live below the poverty line, while one-third are in such difficult financial straits that they forgo buying essential foods, according to the National Insurance Institute. By all accounts, haredi Jews and Israeli Arabs, both groups that have a high birth rate and are to some degree alienated from mainstream society, account for a disproportionate percentage of Israel's underclass.

Israel's Arab minority, which now constitutes 20 per cent of its population and may rise to 30 per cent within about a generation, is particularly disaffected. The descendants of Palestinians who did not join the mass exodus of Arabs in 1948, Israeli Arabs enjoy equal rights, but in practice, they are subjected to discrimination in employment, housing and budgetary allocations. Although a handful of Israeli Arabs have attained wealth and status, a poll released in March indicated that three-quarters of Israeli Jews believe they should be "transferred" to a future Palestinian state.

Sephardi Jews once felt like outsiders, and this sense of outrage led to the formation of the Black Panthers protest movement in 1971. But the situation has improved, judging by the intermarriage rate between Ashkenazim and Sephardim and the high positions attained by such Sephardim as David Levy, Yitzhak Navon, Shaul Mofaz, Amir Peretz and Yitzhak Mordechai.

Israel is a country of immigration, a haven for the persecuted, and hundreds of thousands of Jews from all corners of the globe, particularly the Soviet Union, the Arab world and Iran, have settled in the Jewish state under the Law of Return. Yet perhaps as many as a million yordim, including highly skilled professionals, have emigrated to destinations in the West.

After six decades of struggle, Israel is a work in progress, a nation that wants to be democratic and Jewish but may not be able to be so, a nation rooted in hope and steeled in adversity, a nation whose achievements are legion, a nation whose shortcomings are clear and a nation whose future cannot possibly be divined in a region convulsed by upheaval, violence and change.

1948... They Were There

USY convention to include teens from ex-USCJ shuls

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ezra Moses is still concerned about the future of the Eastern Canadian Region of United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY), but the 18-year-old Montrealer is not as worried as he was last fall, when he heard that some shuls with USY chapters might leave the umbrella body of Conservative Judaism.

Moses, ECRUSY's president and a student at Montreal's Dawson College, said he still worries about a potential loss of members from Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, and Beth Tzedec Congregation – the three large Toronto shuls that decided this spring to cut ties with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and allocate the money they would have spent on USCJ dues to more local programming.

Ezra Moses and Dov Smiley

But now that Moses knows that four other Toronto shuls are retaining their affiliation with the Conservative umbrella body, "I don't worry about the region disappearing," he said. "The region is strong, and will be resilient against this."

Shuls can't have USY chapters unless they're USCJ members, but high school students from the newly unaffiliated congregations who have paid their annual dues are still USY members until their dues expire, said Rabbi Jennifer Gorman, director of youth activities for ECRUSY, which also includes Kadima, the USCJ's program for middle school students.

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman

Students from the disaffiliated shuls will, therefore, be able to attend this weekend's regional convention of USY and Kadima, being held in St. Catharines, if they want to.

ECRUSY has about 450 members representing eight synagogues in six cities from Montreal to London, Ont., in addition to the three that have left. Other cities represented in ECRUSY are Ottawa, Toronto, St. Catharines and Hamilton.

To attend regional and international conventions or receive program scholarships, USY members must pay regional dues of $22 annually in addition to their USY chapter dues. The regional dues are paid through the chapters, and members must be chapter members in order to be regional members. Chapter members don't have to belong to a particular synagogue to join its USY chapter.

"The only question [was] whether [members from the synagogues that left] would be required to join another chapter," said Paul Kochberg, president of the USCJ's Canadian region and chair of the USCJ's youth commission. "We don't want to penalize the kids, especially at this late date."

But there is another issue. At least one USY member whose shul has left the USCJ is running for a regional board position.

"At this point, [members of synagogues that have left USCJ] are still members," said Rabbi Gorman. "If it becomes an issue next year, we'll have to cross that bridge when we come to it. I will not say, 'Thanks for your time, but because of the decision made by a few adults, this dream you had of running for executive board is not going to happen.'"

The convention will bring together 78 USYers and 36 Kadima members, and applications were still coming in as of last week, said Rabbi Gorman, herself a USY alumna. At least 10 Kadima students from synagogues that have left the USCJ had registered for the convention, she said.

This month's event is one of at least three annual regional conventions and one larger international one that is attended by thousands of teens from across North America. The conventions combine religious, social, social action, Israel-related and leadership activities.

Moses, who has been involved with USY for four years, said he has learned "a lot of leadership skills" during that time.

Also, he added, although he comes from an observant home – his father is Rabbi Lionel Moses of Montreal's Shaare Zion Congregation – he has "definitely learned a lot of Judaism over my four years."

The interaction that students have with their peers from other cities at regional and international meetings is "a huge benefit," Rabbi Gorman said. "You learn so much about how Judaism is expressed in different [geographic] areas... [and] you make friendships during these events that last a lifetime."

Paul Kochberg

When Rabbi Gorman, a native of Long Island, N.Y., and her husband, Rabbi Sean Gorman, moved to Toronto so he could accept a position at Beth Tzedec, they already had friends here, a fact she attributes in part to her USY background.

"Knowing you're part of the greater Jewish community is very significant, and I don't think that without looking beyond your geographic area there's the same connection," she said.

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman currently teaches once a month at Beth Tzedec, one of the disaffiliated shuls, but she said her "dedication to USY certainly doesn't waver."

Dov Smiley, ECRUSY's executive vice-president for Israel affairs, said the Toronto shuls' decisions to leave the organization shows "divides in Toronto that shouldn't exist... Now more than ever, the synagogues need unity to keep the youth interested in Judaism."

Last Wednesday, Smiley implored group members in a posting on ECRUSY's Facebook site to vote in a CJN online poll on whether Toronto Conservative synagogues should remain within the USCJ.

"In the wake of this ridiculous secession going on, we are trying to inform the public that the abolisment [sic] of USCJ in Canada will be disastrous for its youth, so show the world that you want to stay by voting. REMEMBER: NO USCJ IN CANADA, THERE WILL BE NO USY," he wrote.

Reena receives $2 million from province

Funds to go towards 60-unit supportive housing complex

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Ontario Liberal government has made a $2-million capital investment in Reena, a non-profit Jewish support agency for people with special needs in York Region.

The money – part of a greater $7.6- million province-wide investment that includes similar agencies – will go toward Reena's planned 60-unit supportive housing complex on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

Madeleine Meilleur, the province's minister of community and social services, made the announcement last week at Reena's Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre in Vaughan in front of delighted staff and clients of the centre.

"It's important for people with a developmental disability to live in their own community in a place that meets their needs," Meilleur said. "This new housing project will provide the right environment… a space tailored to their needs and abilities."

Meilleur added that the government intends to spend more on people with developmental disabilities in the future.

"We know there's more to do, and we will continue to… add it in our [future] budgets," she said.

Among those on hand to share in the congratulations were Richmond Hill city councillor David Cohen; Liberal MPP for Willowdale David Zimmer; UJA Federation of Greater Toronto chair, David Koschitzky; and Reena's founding chair, Rabbi Joseph Kelman.

"We have naches today," Rabbi Kelman announced in an impromptu speech after Meilleur stepped away from the podium. "[Reena] is a model for the world. We've satisfied our motto… integrating the handicapped into our community."

For her part, Reena CEO Sandy Keshen told The CJN she believes the new complex, tentatively called the Reena Community Residence, would help encourage her clients to better integrate into society.

Additionally, Keshen said she hopes that the residence's proximity to schools such as the Anne and Max TannenbaumCHAT Kimel Family Education Centre on the Lebovic campus will encourage students to volunteer at Reena.

"The model for us will be one of shared support and affordable housing," Keshen said. "We want to use the campus from an inclusion perspective."

The current Reena building, on Clarke Avenue in Vaughan, will continue to be used for outreach purposes, but the organization has outgrown the building's capacity, Keshen said.

According to the Ministry of Community and Social Services literature, Ontario is home to "approximately 38 per cent of people in Canada with a developmental disability."

Currently, Reena serves nearly 1,000 adults and children with developmental disabilities via daytime and evening programs and supports more than 350 clients in 132 housing locations throughout the city.

According to Keshen, Reena's new supportive housing complex will allow her organization to help another 36 special needs individuals with lodgings.

Other Jewish service organizations will also be included in the new space, including Chai Tikvah, Circle of Care and Jewish Family and Child, she said.

"The importance of this model is that there will be one company that will deliver support to all the organizations," Keshen said. "That might be Reena, but right now I've hired a consultant to help us look at this creatively to provide more support with less administration."

Jerusalem sensory garden focus of Israel@60 event

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn, in partnership with Jewish Vocational Service, is highlighting Israel Elwyn's Sensory Garden in Jerusalem as part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel@60 celebrations May 20 at the Barbara Frum Library.

Israel Elwyn, whose Canadian office is located at JVS, is one of Israel's largest providers of services such as rehabilitation, supported living, vocational training and employment, for people with special needs, providing them with the means to achieve independence and integration into the community.

The 3,000-square-metre Katie Manson Sensory Garden, located at Israel Elwyn, includes interactive devices to encourage physical and emotional development in a stimulating environment.

David Marcu, executive director of Israel Elwyn, will provide an audio-visual presentation of the garden at the event. He said the garden's purpose is to extend therapeutic activity from the treatment room into a natural setting.

"[We created a garden] that enhances quality of life and emphasizes activities that integrate interactive devices with the natural environment," Marcu said.

"[Our aim] was to have the garden oriented toward adults but also suited for children, be accessible to people with various types of disabilities, and be suitable for use by people with different levels of cognitive and motor impairment."

Karen Goldenberg, president and CEO of JVS Toronto and a Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn board member, said that in celebrating Israel @60, the two agencies want to help raise awareness of the "brilliant" work going on in Israel.

When she toured the garden, she said, she encountered a group of Jewish children with multiple disabilities, another group of Arab students who were autistic, and a number of visitors from the public. "To me, that proved how inclusive the garden is. It reaches out to everyone."

The May 20 event, chaired by Friends board member David Rechtsman, is free to to the public. "It is not a fundraiser. We're proud of the magnificent work done by Israel Elwyn, and we want people to know about it," Goldenberg said.

Fundraiser to benefit Weizmann Institute, University of Toronto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Toronto physician Arnie Aberman will be honoured this year by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science and the University of Toronto at a gala dinner on Nov. 3.

The event will be held at the Sheraton Centre Hotel. It will be co-chaired by David Naylor, president of the University of Toronto, and by Daniel Zajfman, president of the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel.

Funds raised at the dinner will be shared equally by both universities, for their MD and PhD programs.

Mel Silverman, founding director of the U of T MD/PhD program, said that students enrolled it must fulfil all the requirements of both the MD and PhD degrees, which he said can take from 14 to 16 years to complete.

"It is a long-term investment, with the objective of a career as a clinician scientist, one who can go from the lab to the bedside and back again," he added.

Michael Ward, a sixth-year student in the program at U of T, is researching genetic therapies for those with cardiovascular disease. "It's a great experience," he said, although it means "putting off your life until your mid-30s."

Besides the time, he said, it is a considerable financial burden on the student.

Dr. Amir Shlomai, who already has both degrees, is now completing his residency in internal medicine at Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv. He is especially interested in liver disease and has researched the Hepatitis B virus.

He praised the atmosphere in the Weizmann MD/PhD program as one in which participants "think, talk, and dream science."

Montreal-born Aberman studied pulmonary diseases and critical care medicine at Albert Einstein College of Medicine, the University of California at San Francisco and the University of of Southern California in Los Angeles. He has written and lectured extensively on the problems of critically ill patients.

He has been physician-in-chief of the Toronto Hospital and Mount Sinai Hospital, dean and chair of the faculty of medicine, U of T, and U of T vice-provost. He also played a major role in the the establishment of the new Northern Ontario School of Medicine of Lakehead University and Laurentian University.

He has served on the boards of many hospitals and professional organizations.

Cycling fundraiser to be held for heart and stroke

The Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario's 21st Annual Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart takes place on June 1.

This year, more than 12,000 enthusiastic cyclists and in-line skaters will take to the road, travelling along a traffic-free Gardiner Expressway and Don Valley Parkway.

This fun-filled event is one of Canada's largest cycling fundraisers. The participants will be raising funds for the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario, to support breakthrough medical advancements and education to prevent and reduce death and disability from heart disease and stroke.

Gathering pledges is crucial to the success of the Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart. Last year, generous participants raised a record $2.8 million in Ontario. This year, the goal is $3 million. Corporate teams, individual cyclists and in-line skaters are all putting their heart into the tremendous effort to meet that goal.

If you're participating on your bicycle, you can choose from a variety of distances along the cycling route. Pedal the beginners' route of 25 kilometres or go 50 kilometres. Feeling ambitious? The 75-kilometre route is for you. If you want to join the 75-kilometre ride or take the 7:15 a.m. early bird ride (25 kilometres or 50 kilometres), simply raise a minimum of $60 in addition to your registration fee and submit it by June 1. If you're an in-line skater, you can complete five kilometres, 10 kilometres or 20 kilometres on the Gardiner, west of Exhibition Place.

The easiest way to collect your pledges is online. You can set up your own Personal Profile fundraising page at www.rideforheart.ca. Registration for the 21st Annual Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart takes place online at www.rideforheart.ca until May 27, at 11:59 p.m.; by fax at 416-932-1620; by phone at 416-486-RIDE; or by mail (Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart, P.O. Box 1227, STN. K, 2384 Yonge Street, Toronto, Ont. M4P 3E4).

Bayefsky has little hope for Durban II meet

Neuer suggested Iran's "anti-Jewish animus" was further stoked by anger at "Canada's lead role in a UN General Assembly resolution that spoke out for victims of Iranian human rights violations."

Bayefsky said developments at the preparatory conference give little hope Durban II will be much different than the 2001 Durban I conference.

Durban I was used by "the worst human rights violators to cast themselves as the anti-racists." Durban II will likely be "a major step backward for the protection of human rights," she said.

Bayefsky pointed to several developments that suggest Arab and Muslim countries are attempting to set the agenda for Durban II. During the preparatory work, "there have been numerous statements that anti-Semitism is about Arabs and Muslims. It is an effort to deny Jews as victims by appropriating anti-Semitism," she said.

In addition, she said, "there is an effort to undermine dramatically the freedom of expression in the name of Islamophobia. To avoid criticism for the xenophobia in Islamic societies, you are seeing this constant references to Islamophobia, with the perpetrators being western societies."

A resolution advanced by Canada on freedom of expression was "butchered" by the UN Human Rights Council, she said, with Islamic countries amending it to require the rapporteur on free speech to report criticisms of Islam.

It's a reaction to the publication of editorial cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad in a Danish newspaper, which sparked violent protests by Muslims in 2006, she said.

"The council is turning freedom of expression on its head, if it offends the feelings of religious extremists," Bayefsky added.

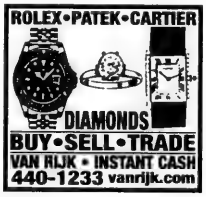
Gissin said that as a diplomat, he's had occasion to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut outside of Israel in his various prior posts. But he expects that none of those prior experiences will compare with the one Toronto's Jewish community has planned for May 8.

"The love for Israel in Toronto, you'll not find another [Diaspora] community… that combines the strength, unity and efficiency as well as this one, and celebrates Israel in an event with 8,000 people," he said, referring to the Israel@60 bash at the Ricoh Coliseum.

"I want to tell all of Toronto's Jewish communities to come. The Russians, the Israelis… If you care about Israel, be there. It's a unique blend of unity and show of strength which can happen only here in Toronto," he urged.



Gissin has stated he's on a mission to help re-brand Israel on the world stage, shifting its image from one of a country in constant conflict to one of a nation of perpetual accomplishment.

Gissin said the marketing around Israel's 60th anniversary has helped nudge that positive image forward.

"Tourism was good last year. It will be better this year," he said. "We're sensing a change, especially among the younger generation and Christians. Israel is not just these flat images they see on the news. Instead, people see there's something cool, new and relevant happening here."

Anecdotally, Gissin said he's noticed a shift in focus by the media and in general opinion over the past year when it comes to Israel.

"It's true, we don't have all the positive images because of our enemies' attempts to brand Israel as 'apartheid'… despite these 10 per cent of people who hate our guts, the 80 per cent who know nothing about Israel now have a chance to know how Israel can [positively] affect their lives."

Looking beyond Yom Ha'atzmaut, Gissin said he plans to make many more public appearances over the course of the year to help get the positive word out on his beloved country.

Inventions make it easier to live halachically

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

A Toronto rabbi has turned ingenious halachic loopholes into a way to make life more convenient for Sabbath-observant Jews.

With items ranging from lamps and oral hygiene aids to magnetic message centres, Rabbi Shmuel Veffer, Rebbetzin Chana Veffer and Moshe Orzech have designed a line of products that help make the observant Jewish lifestyle easier to keep.

The Veffers have a knack for finding everyday problems that people put up with and creating rabbinically approved solutions. They founded Kosher Innovations in 2004, out of a desire to help the observant community find adaptations in the modern world. As well, they work to educate people in Jewish law, and give sources and explanations on their website (www.kosherimage.com) for how their products meet rabbinical standards.

Currently, Kosher Innovations offers 10 products, with three more on the way. "These are items that were created out of problems me and my family found annoying," Rabbi Veffer said. "I kept thinking that there had to be a better way."

The Kosher Lamp, now in four models, was the first invention, with one that comes in a size that's perfect for children – a 31-centimetre-tall, teddy-bear-shaped nightlight. The lamps feature a shade that turns to let out or block the light, so that a person can turn the light "off" on Shabbat without turning off the bulb.

Veffer's not only a rabbi, but fittingly, he also has a degree from the University of Waterloo in mathematics and computer science, thus making for the perfect marriage of Torah knowledge and physics. Before becoming a rabbi, he devised computerized solutions for companies with technical predicaments. "I'm always trying to think of a way to do things differently," Rabbi Veffer said. "I like to come up with a sideways-thinking solution to problems."

The Kosher Lamp idea germinated from Rabbi Veffer's wife, who wanted to read in bed on Shabbat. One of his children, who has an affinity for building projects, decided that one Sunday afternoon, during father-son time, they would solve the problem together. After a trip to the local hardware store and a day's experimenting, they had a prototype.

They discussed the idea with Moshe Orzech; a fellow member of their synagogue, the Village Shul. Orzech happened to be in the lighting business. He had the contacts and networks necessary to release the product to the public.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Organ donation is a mitzvah

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

Last month, we marked National Organ Donor Week. The idea of organ donation isn't something we should take for granted, nor is it something we should assume will be available to us when it's needed. Right now, 6,000 people are waiting for an organ, and an average of five people die every week waiting for one to be donated.

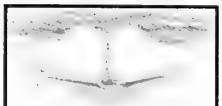
But the numbers don't tell the whole tale.

Consider the story of Alisa Flatow, 20, who in 1995 took the year off to study at a Jerusalem yeshiva. She decided before Passover to travel to Gaza, but she never made it. A Hamas suicide bomber drove his van into the bus she was travelling on, mortally wounding her.

Arriving from his home in New Jersey, Stephen Flatow confirmed that the brain-dead young woman on life support was his daughter. Hospital staff asked him whether he would be willing to donate his daughter's organs. After consulting with their rabbi, Stephen and his wife decided to donate Alisa's organs to six people on a waiting list who were clinging to life.

Alisa once wrote, "As Jews, it is our responsibility to help Jews less fortunate than we are."

Her heart was successfully transplanted into a 56-year-old man who had been waiting more than a year for one. Her pancreas and one kidney were transplanted into a 42-year-old woman with kidney failure who was reported to have been waiting 20 years for the organs.



Rabbinic Reflections

Flatow's lungs, liver and other kidney were transplanted into other patients. Her corneas were donated to the eye bank at Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva.

Her father said, "People have called it a brave decision, a righteous decision, a courageous decision. To us, it was simply the right thing to do at the time. I didn't know what all the media attention was about. But as I was leaving Israel, at the airport, I mentioned this to a journalist, who said to me, 'You really don't understand, do you?'"

What Alisa's father didn't understand was the emotional impact his family's gesture had on a grieving country – an impact captured by the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who said at the time that "Alisa Flatow's heart beats in Jerusalem."

The Toronto Board of Rabbis and the provincial agency responsible for administering the organ donation program have joined forces to defeat the idea that organ donation is forbidden in Judaism.

Some believe it will preclude them from being buried in a Jewish cemetery. But I'm here to tell you that this belief is false. Since the 1950s, leading rabbinic authorities have looked upon this new technology as a way to fulfil the divine mandate to save a life – an obligation first expressed in the Torah itself: "You shall not stand idly by the blood of your neighbour." This obligation also includes giving blood, bone marrow transplants and donating redundant organs.

Judaism affirms this principle in the most unambiguous terms, because no one should see the preservation of human life as optional – for Jews, it is obligatory.

Judaism urges that consent be given for post-mortem organ donation when requested by doctors and hospitals for use when directly needed for life-saving transplantation procedures. This applies to an individual in anticipation of his or her own death, as well as to health-care proxies or next of kin whenever they are legally empowered to make such decisions. It's our belief that by so doing, we render a profound and genuine honour to the deceased.

So young, and yet so ancient

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Israel, our beloved Israel, is turning 60 years old, so young for a modern state. It has accomplished so much and is consistently challenged. With its young voice, it speaks to the Jews of the world, who hear that voice with our hearts. Israel is growing and learning, and the country is still so young.

Midrashic Moments

Sitting on a foundation of text and covenant, Israel should enjoy its Day of Independence as we share with it our understanding of Jewish text and the number 60. The Talmud and midrash express so many thoughts about this number that we are able to offer Israel our blessings for this wonderful year with ancient insights.

Sixty is for renewal. While the waters of the flood of Genesis rained for 40 days and nights, we learn that they drained in 60 days.

Sixty is for guardianship. As Jacob, our patriarch, is returning to the ancient land of Israel, we learn that 60 myriads of angels escort him home.

Sixty is for spirituality. We learn that while the Shchinah will rest upon an assembly of 10 people, She will not rest upon less than 60 myriads of angels.

Sixty is for forgiveness. The first crime of one human being against another is Cain against his brother. Cain pleads with God, stating: "Surely my sin is not greater than that of the 60 myriads of Israel who will provoke You in the wilderness." God replies, "If I do not forgive Cain, I will shut the door in the face of all penitents." We are forgiven.

Sixty is for leadership. Rabbi Tanhum teaches: normally a burden that is heavy for one is light for two, but can a burden too heavy for 60 myriads be light for one? Now all Israel stood before Mount Sinai saying, "If we hear the Voice of God anymore, we shall die," while Moses heard the Voice by himself and lived.

Sixty is for protection. The Song of Songs tells us that Solomon's bed is surrounded by 60 warriors of Israel. We learn that these warriors are the 60 letters of the priestly blessing.

During one of the more challenging points in Jewish history, while we were travelling in the wilderness, the nation of Israel gathered together to volunteer their goods and their talents to build a mishkan, a place of communal spirituality. They bring donations from their heart and they give of their wealth, their vision, their skills and their talents.

When all is complete, the nation gathers together to dedicate the mishkan with sacrifices and offerings. We are told of the offerings in the Torah, and the midrash adds to our understanding: "The ram offerings were 60, the goats were 60, the lambs were 60. This number symbolizes the 60 myriads of Israel who came out of Egypt. It symbolizes the word 'counsel' whose numerical value is 60. It alludes to the 60 queens, to the Second Temple which was built with the dimensions of 60 by 60... to Elisha who served Israel for 60 years, to the 60 cities of Argov, to the text that states Isaac was 60 years old when his sons were born, to the 60 letters of the priestly blessing."

As the nation of Israel gathered together for its first ritual expression from within the structure they built from their hearts, the number 60 informs the text. The rabbis teach us that at that moment, we express spiritually while understanding the value of good advice, leadership, institutions, politics and personal strife. Sixty is for balance.

Israel, our beloved modern country, sits within our hearts, within our texts, within our history and within our ancient blessings that we are privileged to utter today.

As modern Jews of the 21st century, we offer Israel our blessing with words that are thousands of years old.

What could be more fitting?

Sects and the Dead Sea Scrolls

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The period of the Dead Sea Scrolls, roughly from the second century BCE until the end of the first century CE, has been described by the eminent Harvard scholar Frank Moore Cross as a rich cauldron bubbling over with religious ideas and groups expounding them.

Risa Levitt Kohn, the curator for the upcoming Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit, to be held at the Royal Ontario Museum in the summer and fall of 2009, has said in her book, A Portable Religion, that even the term Judaism is not quite appropriate for these various nascent views. She prefers the Greek word, Judaismos, as a more apt name for the beliefs found in the land, which the Romans called Judaea after Pompey added it to their expanding dominions in 63 BCE.

There were a number of religious groups in the Land of Israel at that time. They have been variously called sects, groups, movements or parties. The best known of these groups are the Pharisees, Sadducees, Zealots and Essenes – and for want of a better term, the Jewish Christians or Christian Jews. Only two of these sects would survive the traumatic events associated with the destruction of the Second Temple. One was the Pharisees, the other the so-called Christians.

The destruction of the Second Temple would be just as important in the development of Christianity as it was for the development of Judaism. Until the cataclysmic events of 70 CE, the Jesus movement was controlled by those who wanted the group to adhere to its Jewish roots. Chief among them was Peter, and the apparent leader of the group, James, the brother of Jesus, whose supposed ossuary aroused much controversy when it was on display at the ROM a few years ago.

With the destruction of the Temple, it was the Pharisees who would come to dominate Judaism, while the Jesus movement fell increasingly under the control of those members who gravitated to the teaching of Paul, who believed that Christianity should place its emphasis on converting the Gentiles. To achieve this end, Paul moved the group beyond its original confines in Judaea and into the world of the eastern Mediterranean.

Although the eastern Mediterranean was part of the Roman empire, its common language was Greek, thanks to the conquests of Alexander the Great in the fourth century BCE. The popularity of Greek is demonstrated by the fact that the first translation of the Bible, the Septuagint, was into Greek, in the city of Alexandria. It was there that a sizable group of Jewish expatriates nearly succumbed to the seductive charms of assimilating into the Hellenistic Greek culture of the time. It was to these affluent Jewish communities of the eastern Mediterranean, and their neighbours, that Paul took his message.

Based on his work on the Scrolls, the eminent Oxford scholar Geza Vermes believes that it was in this Greek-speaking environment that the concept of divinity was attached to Christ. Vermes believes that the appellation "son of God" was not uncommon in Judaea at this time and could have any number of meanings attached to it that did not imply a divine nature. These meanings include the first born of Israel, or the saintly figures of the nation, or even all members of Am Yisrael. But in the Greek culture of the eastern Mediterranean, a son of God could be a semi-divine being such as Hercules or Achilles, who were the product of a union between a mortal and a deity.

However, Cross disagrees with Vermes and cites a document found at Qumran that he believes has divine connotations for the term "son of God." Such is the fascinating nature of the ongoing debate about the Dead Sea Scrolls as the evidence of the Past pushes Forward into the future.

Israel's birthday: six for sixty

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Israel is about to celebrate its birthday, a special one at that. And that means for a small country that is constantly under the microscope of the world's – and its own – media, it's time to celebrate and forget about its many challenges, at least for a few hours. In honour of this occasion, I present an eclectic half-dozen websites. Six for sixty.

But first, we remember. Before Israel celebrates, it marks Yom Hazikaron, Israel's Remembrance Day, and honours the more than 20,000 soldiers who have fallen since Israel's War of Independence. Israel's Ministry of Defence maintains a large Hebrew-only website dedicated to Yom Hazikaron. You can view a list of all soldiers whose yahrzeit is being observed today. [izkor.gov.il/izkor50.asp] On the Yizkor page, you can read the special prayer for the fallen soldiers while hearing it recited [izkor.gov.il/izkor11b.htm]. A Hebrew poetry page includes works of some of the country's premier poets and King David's lament from the Book of Samuel II upon hearing of the deaths of Jonathan and Saul, "How the Mighty Have Fallen." [izkor.gov.il/izkor30a. htm]

As the sun sets on Yom Hazikaron, the mood in Israel shifts from sorrow to joy as Yom Ha'atzmaut begins. If you won't be joining the crowds on Hamelech George Street in Jerusalem or on Dizengoff Street in Tel Aviv this year, you can sample the excitement via some of the videos on YouTube. On the first page alone, there are excerpts from several Independence Day concerts, a fireworks display, a slide show of Israeli flags and archival footage of Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, reading the Declaration of Independence. [tinyurl.com/5gqclx]

Speaking of Israel's first prime minister, what would a birthday be without some introspection? Back in 1961, on the occasion of Israel's bar mitzvah year, Ben-Gurion wrote an article for the Atlantic Monthly titled The Kingdom of the Spirit, in which he suggested that far more than a mere "national and political unit," Israel is to become a spiritual arena in which "a new way toward freedom, peace, justice and equality, the advancement and redemption of humanity." [tinyurl.com/6hkepu]

I love listening to Israeli radio on my computer. Unfortunately, finding their addresses can be a chore. That's why I am hooked on a piece of software appropriately called Israel Radio. After you download it, a special toolbar becomes part of your browser. Simply click on preset buttons for about 20 Israeli radio stations to have them start playing almost immediately.

Regular readers of this column may notice that I rarely recommend software that you can download. You're just never quite sure what it may do to your computer. I can't guarantee how it will function for you but in the several months I've used Israel Radio, I've never experienced a problem. It works with both Internet Explorer and Firefox in Windows. The Firefox version has only limited functionality on Macs. [israelradio.lihi.co.il]

I'm also a sucker for maps. Although you can find many standard Israeli maps online, I particularly like Eye On Israel's online map. Not only is it quite detailed, it also has a dose of whimsy that you could only find on an interactive map. Tiny trains make their way up and down the coastline map, while a sailboat plies the waters of Lake Kinneret. [tinyurl.com/489bg]

Soon Israel's birthday will be over and things will be back to normal. There will be no shortage of news stories that will question Israel's direction for the next 60 years and beyond. Honest reportage and criticism do play a critical role. But if you ever need a respite and a reminder of what the country can achieve, I recommend paying a visit to Israel21C, a site devoted to highlighting the stories you won't see on the evening news.

A recent sampling of Israel21C included a look at a program that helps disadvantaged kids learn leadership skills; a short documentary about what may be the world's first pomegranate wine; and an article about an Israeli company that is making men's suits using material made from wool and recycled plastic bottles. [israel21c. net]

Hillel sends volunteers to work with Ethiopian-Israelis

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Following the success of a student volunteer trip to Kiryat Moshe to work with the Ethiopian community last year, Hillel of Greater Toronto is getting set to send more students to Israel this summer to volunteer with the growing Ethiopian community in Bat Yam.

The volunteers have been divided into two groups – one that leaves May 15, and the other that leaves June 29 – for a six-week program that includes accommodation, health insurance and a stipend that covers groceries and travel costs in Israel, as well as two Shabbatons, weekly group dinners, organized field trips, lessons and other extra-curricular programming.

Rebecca Woods Baum, Hillel of Greater Toronto's Israel affairs director, organized the program with the Israel Volunteer Program Centre's regional director, Michal Kaye, as well as the Jewish Agency and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

She said the students will volunteer most of the day and will keep hours similar to that of a full-time job.

"In the morning, generally what the students will be doing is teaching English and helping with English homework with kids in grades 6 to 9, and in the afternoon, they will be running programs in the teen centre," she said.

Although the site of the program has changed from Kiryat Moshe to Bat Yam, Woods Baum said the Jewish Agency was so pleased with the success of last year's program that its given this year's volunteers the option to work in Kiryat Moshe for a few days.

"The idea is to understand Israeli society. It's a six-week trip and they are living on their own… They go grocery shopping by themselves, they take public transit within areas that are safe on their own. They have to work these things out on their own… It's really about getting integrated with Israeli society and doing tzedec while you're in Israel," Woods Baum said.

Samahra Zatzman, 21, a fourth-year theatre major at York University, took part in last year's program and said she loved the experience.

She was one of six participants who stayed in a house provided by Hillel in the Kfar Galil neighbourhood near Kiryat Moshe, where they volunteered.

While some of the volunteers chose to work in a community centre for high school kids, Zatzman worked next door to the centre with Chetz Kadima, an after-school program for underprivileged and at-risk youth aged eight to 14 in the community.

She said it was a place where kids could go to keep them off the streets.

"Some of the stuff we did was help kids with their homework, and then we got to create programs. I taught an English class twice a week. I did a girl's class, where we did nail polish, beading, and sometimes we'd play sports."

Having had experience volunteering with youth in Canada, Zatzman said she felt comfortable with the kids, but it took a couple weeks for the kids at Chetz Kadima to wrap their heads around the idea that someone wanted to spend her free time with them.

"Their first question was, 'Why are you here?' It took them a while to stop asking that… because the only experience they had with Canadian Jewish students were with people that came on Birthright, which is still a great thing, but they would come in for a day, play basketball and then go home. Their question was, 'Why would you want to spend your vacation here helping us?'" Zatzman recalled.

But once they realized she would be there to help for the next few weeks, friendships began to develop.

"They want to challenge you. They make jokes, they make fun of your accent because you're speaking Hebrew. I mean, I went to CHAT [the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto], but I didn't know that chaver meant boyfriend and yadid meant friend," she said, laughing.

Zatzman said the experience was both challenging and rewarding, and it taught her that she had a lot more tenacity and perseverance than she thought.

"I've always lived in Toronto, I go to school in Toronto, I live at home and this was about me going out and living on my own."

She said they had free time to explore Israel and meet with family and friends to get a better idea of what it's like to live like an Israeli.

"But it was about more than just having fun… I learned that when I apply myself and dedicate myself, there is such a wealth that can come out. You're also gaining from it. Giving back isn't always an altruistic thing. It it is also a wonderful personal thing," she said.

"I saw the vitality and the energy of this community, from all the different kinds of people that were living there… everyone was invested in trying to build up the community and make it a wonderful place."

She said that for those looking to experience Israel in a different way, this is an amazing opportunity.

"Birthright is wonderful and going on tours is wonderful, but this is above and beyond the tourist experience. If you really want to experience Israel and have a better understanding about life in Israel – the complexities, the joy, everything – then volunteering in Israel is the No. 1 thing I would recommend to anyone."

The deadline to apply for the June 29 program is May 9. For more information, e-mail Woods Baum at rebecca@hilleltoronto.org.

Iran 'preparing for another Holocaust'

Canada can help stop Islamic Republic, MP says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

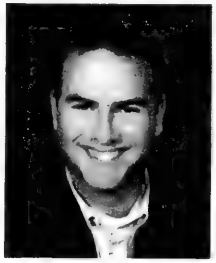
OTTAWA — In a message delivered by Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier, the Canadian government used the occasion of the fifth annual Holocaust Remembrance Day ceremony on Parliament Hill to reaffirm its support for the State of Israel.

"We are proud to stand with Israel, a fellow democracy," Bernier said last Thursday. "We are proud to defend its right to survive in freedom, dignity and security, and we are proud to count ourselves among Israel's best friends."

The two-hour event included messages from all of Canada's major political parties and was attended by members of Parliament, senators and representatives of more than 40 embassies.

Bloc Québécois MP Richard Marceau, who brought forward the bill that led to Ottawa's recognition of Holocaust Remembrance Day, warned of a "new danger" facing the Jewish people.

"The current leader of a powerful country has said time and time again that he wants to eradicate Israel… the current president of Iran and his regime are preparing for another Holocaust," Marceau said.



Richard Marceau

He implored the Canadian government to take action.

"Canada can make a difference. Canada can contribute to stopping Iran… take the right stand against Iran's nuclear aspiration. Iran needs to understand that Canada will not sit quietly, will not stand by, will not do nothing… Yes, today we remember but today, also, we must act," he said.

"Today, with words and silence we remember the millions of people, the overwhelming majority of whom were Jews, who were systematically murdered under the Nazi regime," said Liberal leader Stéphane Dion.

"It is our duty to remember. It is our duty to fight racism everywhere – anti-Semitism, hatred and intolerance – wherever we find it… and we must work every day to ensure they do not take root in our country."

Messages of support were also delivered by BQ leader Gilles Duceppe on behalf of his party, as well as by NDP leader Jack Layton.

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, cautioned that the memory of the Holocaust must be kept alive in order to prevent a re-occurrence in the future.

"On behalf of the State of Israel, permit me to express our appreciation and extreme pride that Canada commemorates this on the steps of Parliament, in the presence of the leadership of Canada," Baker said. "May Canada and Israel go from strength to strength. Am Yisrael Chai!"

Child survivor Joseph Gottdenker related his moving story of being hidden by a Christian family who saved his life by risking theirs.

Holocaust survivors have retaliated against the Nazi regime "in the best way possible," Gottdenker said – by living and contributing to the world in many ways.

But "the world is still not a safe place… [and] remembering is not enough. My pain, that of my family, the destruction of my entire childhood is for naught unless we act in defence of those that cannot protect themselves," Gottdenker said.

World renowned architect and developer David Azrieli was introduced by Marceau as "a powerful testament to the resilience of Holocaust survivors."

Azrieli, who was born in 1922 in Poland and settled in Montreal in 1954, spoke of the contributions made to the world by survivors in science, the arts and every other field.

"This is our message, a message of life and creative life, a message that rings out loud and clear," Azrieli said. "We are alive and this is our victory and this is our revenge against the Nazis… With this contribution, we show our devotion and our commitment to life."

He added: "We must turn our thoughts, our minds to the living, to the country that gave us the opportunity and that gave us the means of becoming creative individuals again and the country that we are celebrating with great affection, the country that has adopted us – Canada."

Throughout the ceremony, wreaths were laid by survivors and the children of survivors, accompanied by politicians and dignitaries. Toronto's Netivot HaTorah Day School Choir performed, and the ceremony was opened and closed by the March on and off of the Colours by the Ottawa Jewish War Veterans.

The ceremony was co-ordinated by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem with the support of B'Nai Brith Canada, Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Embassy of Israel, the Shoah (Holocaust) Committee of Ottawa, and the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

Holocaust scroll readings draw 500

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The sixth annual community Holocaust Remembrance service, the Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah Commemoration, took place last week at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

About 500 people attended the service, which included a recitation of Megillat Hashoah (the Holocaust Scroll), a recently compiled book of English and Hebrew readings of brief, first-person experiences of the war.

Among the stories told in the scroll are that of a Christian journalist surveying the Warsaw Ghetto; of a young Jew forced to shove bodies into death camp ovens, and of a Jewish woman in a work camp.

The six chapters of the megillah were read by various community members and leaders, including Cantor Eli Kirshblum, Mona Brown, Harvey Haber, Cantor Marshall Loomer, Lou Cytrynbaum, David Schaeffer, Rabbi Howard Morrison, Sigal Tuch and Mitchell Goldenberg.

Two choirs performed songs between readings: the Beth Tikvah Synagogue Choir, directed by Eyal Bitton, with accompanist Nathan Rosen; and the Renanim Youth Singers, directed by Susan Michaels, with accompanist Mark Andrews. Songs included Eli, Eli, based on Psalm 22, and Even When God is Silent by Michael Horvit, written for the 50th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

The song Bachuri Le'an Tisa, performed by the Renanim Youth Singers, was written by Gideon Klein in 1942 while he was interned at Terezin. Klein, who died in Terezin three years later at age 26, wrote about love and loss in the camps.

Six candles were lit to commemorate and memorialize different aspects of the Holocaust and related postwar events: a candle apiece for the memory of the six million, the destroyed Jewish communities, the 1½ million murdered children, the ghetto fighters and partisans, the righteous of the nations, and the State of Israel.

Rabbi Wayne Allen, Beth Tikvah's spiritual leader, said he hoped that the service would give survivors "strength for them to continue, and pay tribute to the martyrs who perhaps have no heirs."

In 1992, Alex Eisen of Toronto, a survivor, suggested the idea of Yom HaShoah readings to Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation. The Conservative movement subsequently embraced the effort to compile a service.

The Holocaust Scroll – written by Avigdor Shinan, a professor of Hebrew literature at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, along with an academic committee – was read for the first time publicly in 2003 on Holocaust Remembrance Day.

The scroll was edited by Rabbi David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute, a Conservative seminary in Israel. In Toronto, a different Conservative synagogue takes turns hosting the event each year, Rabbi Allen said.

The practice of reading the scroll has spread through the world and takes place in many languages.

Aaron Jesin, who with his family and wife's parents lit the second candle, said a religious commemoration of the Holocaust was long overdue.

"To a certain extent, the Megillat Hashoah fills this gap. Our only regret is that it is not universally embraced by all factions of Judaism."

Jesin's in-laws, the Weisbergs, and his parents, are survivors. Sam Weisberg was in the same concentration camp with Alex Eisen, and they remain close friends today, Jesin said.

Other participants in the candlelighting were the Frieberg, Markin, Pilc, Gottesman and Waldman families.

"The event profoundly impacted me," he said. "We have survived through a fundamental belief in God. We must never lose hope. We have to persevere."

He said such events are of particular importance today in light of increased ignorance about the Holocaust, and the growing problem of hatred.

"It's not enough to say 'Never again.' The problem is that it is beginning to happen again. Anti-Semitism is on the rise. Anti-Israel sentiments are on the rise."

Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah

Journalist warns of another Shoah

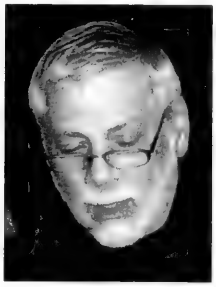
By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Edwin Black issued a challenge to the more than 200 people in the Yom Hashoah audience in Halifax.

"Do we shed a tear with the beautiful music we just heard, and think of the agony of survivor Phil Riteman [one of Halifax's main Yom Hashoah speakers], or do we look ahead 10 years and say, 'What did we know, when did we know it, and what did we do to stop Rwanda, Bosnia and Darfur?'"

The award-winning American journalist and author of six best-selling investigative books also had this warning:

"Can the generation that survived the Holocaust to create Israel be considered successful when we have threats of nuclear annihilation [at the hands of Iran] on our doorstep?"



Edwin Black

In a dynamic presentation at the May 1 event at Saint Mary's University, Black, a Chicago-born, Washington-based author whose parents survived Treblinka, quoted from his international expose, IBM and the Holocaust, a book that's available in 61 countries and 14 languages.

"The Holocaust was special and it has nothing to do with the numbers [six million Jewish deaths]," he said. "It was a 12-year, internationally advertised, out-in-the-open persecution."

He accused business leaders in the United States and Europe of being war criminals.

He said U.S.-based IBM had punch cards on every Jew in Europe, knew where they were, what their abilities were and enabled the Germans to find them and use them. IBM's systems organized the trains that transported Jews and other non-Aryans to the death camps.

He said General Motors provided the trucks that the Germans used to invade Poland, Austria and other European nations.

Even Coca-Cola invented Fanta as a drink to refresh German troops, he said.

All this can happen, and is happening, again because money talks, he continued.

"It took place in the 1930s and 40s, and it is happening now because the Mideast has the oil money and has announced its intention to obliterate Israel with missiles. How? They buy what they need with petro-dollars that I helped give when I drove here, that you provide when you drive your cars."

The audience was as hushed during his 15-minute address as it was when candles were lit to commemorate the millions lost in the Holocaust.

It was as silent as excerpts from letters and essays, written in the 1940s by youthful Holocaust victims and survivors, were read by Halifax-area youths, Jewish and gentile, who have attended the March of the Living and gone on an Asper Foundation-sponsored visit to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

And the audience paid equally rapt attention as Halifax cellist Shimon Walt and pianist Barbara Pritchard played Ernest Bloch's Prayer, from Jewish Life No 1.

Black, the editor of the Cutting Edge News website, which receives nearly 100,000 hits each month, has worked for the New York Times and has been interviewed on national U.S. TV programs such as the Today Show, CNN Wolf Blitzer Reports, Dateline NBC and the Oprah Winfrey Show.

"We have forgotten, but we say we will always remember," he said. "We're forgetting, because holocausts have happened since, and no one is speaking out in the right way. Now another nation [Iran] is pledging to do in 12 minutes what Hitler tried to do in 12 years – wipe out the Jewish people [in Israel]."

Other Yom Hashoah ceremonies took place in Atlantic communities through the weekend in Sydney, N.S., Moncton, N.B., Saint John, N.B., Fredericton, St. John's, and Charlottetown, where large crowds heard talks from Holocaust survivors.

Ceremony remembers 'courage and moral resistance'

BY DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An improvised spoon, a symphony concert, a Lodz Ghetto postcard, a clandestine wedding, an evocative work of expressionist art from Teresienstadt – all were cited as examples of "courage and moral resistance" at last week's Holocaust Memorial Day commemoration at Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Congregation.

These gestures were ways for Jews to maintain vestiges of dignity and humanity in the face of unimaginable suffering, an overflow crowd was told at the event.

Acts of courage and resistance – the evening's theme – did not have to be linked to armed resistance, although such resistance most certainly took place, noted Marcel Tenenbaum, co-chair, with Jack Dym, of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre's Yom Hashoah committee. "Countless acts helped keep hope alive in the uttermost darkness."

Acts of resistance also included the writing of books and creation of schools – even a medical school in the Warsaw Ghetto. Tenenbaum said the logical subject of research, for lack of any resources, was starvation.

The evening included the presence of community leaders, dignitaries, and representatives from all levels of government, including from Germany. Pierre Duchesne, Quebec's lieutenant-governor, attended. Yoram Elron, Israel's consul general in Montreal, called the Holocaust the "darkest and most horrifying tragedy in the history of humanity."

Elron quoted Elie Wiesel's oft-cited statement that indifference remains humanity's greatest sin in the face of evil. "It facilitated the annihilation of two-thirds of European Jewry… history's worst crime."

Elron also cited the Jewish state as a permanent refuge for the Jewish people and a concrete manifestation of how the Jews emerged from the ashes of the Holocaust to create a vital and living land.

Israel's 60th anniversary, he said, "reminds us how far we've come."

Six brief but poignant Holocaust survivor testimonials on video screens preceded the lighting of six memorial candles by those survivors with their children and grandchildren. The ceremony also included a recitation of names of Holocaust victims by Elie Benchetrit, Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz and Hannah Eliashiv. Each candlelighting included readings and choir performances.

Ruth Fazel's ambitious work, Oratorio Terezin, was performed by the Vanier College Choir under conductor Erica Phare. Traditional Holocaust-related songs were performed by the Bialik High School Choir under Lorna Smith. Before the recitations of the K'El Maleh Rachamim, tehillim, Kaddish, the Partisan Hymn, and the Canadian and Israeli national anthems, survivors and members of the second and third generations were respectively asked to rise, and the promise was made to carry forward the Holocaust legacy from generation to generation and ensure that it not be forgotten after the last survivors pass on.

A sporting businessman

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

At 39, Jordan Banks is still young enough to qualify as a whiz kid in the corporate world.

But the Ottawa-born CEO of JumpTV – a burgeoning, Toronto-based international sports Internet broadcasting company – already has a rich history of success in business.

In fact, in 2006 he was chosen as one of Canada's "Top 40 Under 40," an award honouring business leaders who've "reached a significant level of success" before that birthday milestone.

A graduate of Osgoode Hall Law School, Banks practised corporate finance law in Toronto at Goodman, Phillips & Vineberg (now Goodmans') before becoming senior manager of the National Hockey League Players Association's (NHLPA) licensing and international business operations division, working with the league for the latter half of the 1990s.

"I loved my job at the NHLPA," he told Heebonics in a recent interview. "I grew up playing a lot of hockey. There are great people and friends that work there. I think the business of hockey is full of opportunities, a lot of them not yet realized. So I miss being a part of that milieu for sure."

Despite the fact he was working in what many would consider a dream job, in 2000 Banks was lured away from the hockey world by a then-little-known company trying to make inroads in the Canadian economy: eBay.

He was hired as employee number 2 and spent the next seven years helping turn eBay Canada into an online business juggernaut as its managing director.

"We just sorta went from scratch and launched the site in the latter part of 2000, and started having employees and building marketing plans and figuring out how you become the No.1 online shopping destination in Canada at a point in time where e-commerce was still in its infancy," Banks recalled.

After seven successful years with eBay, last year, he decided it was time for new challenges and to get back into the sports realm. So he joined JumpTV as its CEO in November 2007.

It was a calculated move, however.

"When I looked at the JumpTV opportunity, one of the things that intrigued me and jumped out at me was sports. There has been this constant theme that when all else fails, I look back at sports and there will be some gold in them there hills," Banks said. "And [JumpTV's] footprint for this space was perfect in terms of video broadcasting and global consumption."

While he admits that the ramp-up phase of his new job keeps him at travelling and at work upward of 15 hours a day and away from his wife and two children more than he'd like, he's confident that the business will get on track and he will be able to slow his hectic pace shortly.

"I said to my wife, 'Give me six months of being an absent dad and husband, because I think this is a big opportunity and will take a lot of work. Afterwards, you'll probably be sick of seeing me because I'll try and make this up to you,'" he said.

Banks said his goal with JumpTV is to provide consumers "the world's best, interactive and compelling experience through [Internet Protocol] TV."

As such, he said the company is focusing on two subjects, sports and the Hispanic community in the United States because "when you look at the most burgeoning population in the U.S., the one that advertisers are looking to target the most, and I would argue, the one that's most under-served, it's the Hispanic community.

"We have a good footprint in there already with our soccer and Hispanic content, so we're focusing on subscribers for that content."

Still, Banks said he won't rule out other business opportunities if they present themselves.

A case in point are Israeli sports such as basketball and soccer, which he described as "incredibly popular offerings" for his company.

"We are interested in exploring ways to get more Israeli content. The people who are watching it, are watching it in large numbers and they're enjoying it," he said.

When asked if he'd consider looking at deals with his old hockey buddies, Banks said currently there's no official plan to partner JumpTV with the NHL due to its focus on soccer and college sports in the United States and Latin America, but he doesn't rule it out as a possibility down the road.

As dedicated as he is in his business pursuits, Banks is equally, if not more so, unwavering in his philanthropic pursuits, with particular emphasis on the search for a cure for Alzheimer's disease.

He's a board member of the Baycrest Foundation, and in 2000 he founded Sportsfest, a non-profit that raises funds for research into the disease and which has so far raised $900,000 through charitable sporting events he organizes yearly.

"I've had three grandparents suffer and pass away from Alzheimer's," he said. "And I come from an incredibly tight family, both nuclear and extended. So I lived what was going on as a caregiver. I knew early on that I wanted to make a difference in raising funds and awareness for that disease."

Banks set a goal of raising $1 million in the fight against Alzheimer's, and he said this year he expects to meet that objective.

"I knew instinctively that Sportsfest would provide the opportunity to raise my peer group's awareness on Alzheimer's and its horrible effects, and hopefully turn some people on to something I'm passionate about," he added.

Banks said he owes his success in life to growing up in a close-knit family and taking inspiration from how his single mom worked hard to raise him and how his Jewish heritage influenced his values.

"We didn't have much means, but there was a ton of love and support. A lot of which came from my mom's family, who were located in Belleville at the time," he said. "My maternal bubbie and zaide are from Belleville where there was a small but very strong Jewish community.

"I spent a lot of weekends on VIA Rail going from Toronto to Belleville and the centre of that experience was the [Sons of Jacob] synagogue. Whether it was [Shabbat] services, High Holy Days or just large dinners where the local Orthodox Jewish community congregated, that was a big part of growing up and being together."

Banks said he considers himself a "traditionalist" Jew, and believes that the "greatest facet of Judaism" is the role that family plays within the religion.

"I love all of the family elements that are part and parcel of being raised in and participating in a Jewish home," he said, adding that his family is still "shopping" for a congregation to join in the city.

"There's nothing magic about what I'm doing. I attribute a lot of my business success to my involvement in the community. Because I think it provides a more fulsome enjoyment and appreciation for life and accomplishment. I think anybody that is singularly focused [on their career] is missing out on a lot of life experience. Besides my wife and kids, some of my proudest and most exciting experiences of my life have come out of my involvement with the community," he said.

Jordan Banks

"We need to look around and [realize] we are incredibly privileged. Whether from a health, financial or family perspective… we live in the greatest country in the world, in a Jewish community that is probably as strong as you're gonna find in the world, and we need to remind ourselves that we're lucky to have access to that and make sure we give back to those that aren't so lucky." —

Righteous family honoured at Toronto commemoration

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In keeping with the solemnity of the occasion, the audience at last Wednesday's Yom Hashoah community commemoration at Earl Bales Park was asked not to applaud during the 90-minute service.

But the estimated 2,000-plus people at the annual event, co-sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust Centre of Toronto and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, broke that rule with palpable respect to give a standing ovation to the family of Jan and Grietje Hiddema.

The Dutch couple hid Moshe Not, now Moshe Ben Zvi, on their farm in Friesland, Holland, from 1943, when he was 11 years old, until 1945.

The Hiddemas' son Eelke, who now lives in Kingston, Ont., with his family and who visited Ben Zvi in Israel in 2007, accepted a posthumous "Righteous Among the Nations" medal and certificate from Israeli Consul General Amir Gissin on behalf of his parents.

Gissin said the family treated Ben Zvi like their own son. "That family took a great risk for themselves and for their seven children."

Eelke's son John, who said his family was "deeply humbled" by the honour, read a moving letter from Ben Zvi to his father, Eelke, Ben Zvi's childhood friend.

"Today, I do not thank your parents. They would not want to be thanked. But rather, I thank God, who gave your parents a loving heart… They not only saved my life, but the lives of many others who were sheltered in their home," Ben Zvi wrote.

After the war, the Hiddemas offered Ben Zvi a permanent home on learning that he was the sole survivor of his family, but he eventually left to live with a family friend before making aliyah.

Gissin, in his remarks toward the beginning of the service, noted that 250,000 Holocaust survivors still live in Israel.

"Israeli governments were not that efficient in making sure that Holocaust survivors would have the best life possible," he said. "Nowadays, there is a growing understanding for this need, and more active action from the government.

"The second and third generations are the backbone of the State of Israel and of the Toronto community," Gissin said.

He urged audience members to do their "utmost" to ensure that people visit Israel, and to make the connection between "the Holocaust and the existence and continuation of the State of Israel."

Keynote speaker David Azrieli – an architect, real estate developer, philanthropist and Holocaust survivor who spent three years on the run as a teenager during World War II before arriving in Palestine in 1942 – stressed the lessons that survivors provided by embodying decency and dignity in the face of destruction of their families and communities.

"We have also found ways to give back to our communities and to our countries," said Azrieli, who was born in 1922 in Poland and settled in Montreal in 1954.

He paid tribute to survivors' "enormous contribution to the establishment and development of the State of Israel.

"They helped lay the foundation of the [Israel Defence Forces]. They became farmers, lawyers, journalists, athletes, educators, generals, rabbis and spiritual leaders," said Azrieli, who also recalled his happy, secure childhood infused with Jewish culture and Zionist values.

In Canada, he said, "tens of thousands of survivors who came after the war made an important impact on the Canadian Jewish community, in many ways making it more active, and contributing to the vibrant institutions of the Canadian Jewish community and in Canada generally," Azrieli said.

"After years of trauma, we found here an environment of freedom and security in which to rebuild, and in that rebuilding there is triumph."

Addressing survivors directly, Azrieli said they were "extraordinary" for finding it within themselves to "rekindle the spark of life, to love again, to celebrate holidays and anniversaries."

The most important way for survivors to honour their experiences, he said, is to teach the next generation about what happened.

For others, he said, the most important way to honour survivors is to collect and preserve as many testimonies of wartime and postwar experiences as possible, an effort his family foundation is pursuing.

The event also included renditions by the Netivot HaTorah Day School Choir and the Boys' Choir of Grace Church-on-the-Hill. Other participants included Cantor Eric Moses; Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich; General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion; Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post; survivor Arnold Friedman; shofar blower Marty Spring; Farnam Bigdoli and Elayna Fremes of Hillel of Greater Toronto, who read names of Holocaust victims, and Esther Buzaglo and Jeffrey Gottesman of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's new leadership division, who read readings as six commemorative candles were lit.

YOM HASHOAH PLAY: Grade 8 students at Netivot HaTorah Day School performed a play to mark Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah. It depicted the lives of concentration camp survivors after liberation and the long and dangerous road they took to reach Palestine. [Rebecca Ansel photo]

STUDENTS RECALL HOLOCAUST: Grade 8 students at Islington Junior Middle School in Etobicoke recently performed the play Jakob and Tadek, set during the Holocaust, for students in grades 4 to 8. The play was written by Rachel Brass, a teacher at the school, about her late father's survival during the war under an assumed identity as a Christian Pole. In back, from left, are teacher and play director Anne Potocnik, students Jing Wei, Stephanie Antwi, Malik Kaddoura, Madeleine McCoy, and Charles Darkwa. In front, Brass, centre, is flanked by students Esther Lee, left, and Helen Chen. Absent is student Yaseen Reiz, who narrated the play. Potocnik and Brass work on anti-racism issues at the school.

CELEBRATING ISRAEL@60: Middle school students at United Synagogue Day School's Beth Tzedec campus painted this colourful work of art on canvas. The design was created by Joan Loewenstein, the campus' art specialist at the school. It will be part of a silent auction to take place at a gala event on May 13.

Rabbi co-owned Miriam's Fine Judaica for 41 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Rabbi William Rosenthal, a beloved teacher and dedicated volunteer who co-owned Miriam's Fine Judaica for 41 years, died on April 11. He was 97.

Born in Miskolc, Hungary in 1911, he and his brother operated a lumber business. He had attended yeshiva and at age 34, he became engaged to Miriam Schwarcz who lived in Komarno, Czechoslovakia.

Rabbi William Rosenthal

The wedding was planned to take place in Miskolc, but in 1944, things were very difficult for the Jews.

With the help of a gentile friend and employee who provided Miriam with false identity papers from his own daughter, Miriam was taken to Miskolc by her father's friend, Miriam told The CJN.

Miriam and William were married on April 5, 1944, several hours after she arrived in Hungary.

Three months later, William was taken to work in a slave labour camp in the Carpathian Mountains. Miriam was taken from the ghetto to Auschwitz and there she discovered that she was four months pregnant.

Their stories of survival are filled with suffering and miracles. After liberation, they were reunited, and to William's surprise, they had a four-month-old baby boy.

They came to Toronto after travelling to Bratislava, Prague, Paris and Cuba. After working in a mattress company for a short time, William obtained a position in Timmins, Ont., as a rabbi and Hebrew teacher. After one year, the family moved to Sudbury, where he served for 16 years as rabbi, cantor and teacher.

In 1965, the family moved to Toronto and opened Miriam's Fine Judaica on Bathurst Street at Caribou Road which the Rosenthals operated for 41 years.

Knowledgeable about Jewish rituals, he was often asked for advice. When a man came to the store who said he had to say Kaddish and needed tfillin but couldn't afford them, Rabbi Rosenthal gave him the tfillin and taught him how to put them on and how to recite the prayer, his daughter, Lilian, said.

Through the years, he served as rabbi and cantor for High Holy Day services in communities such as Halifax, Glace Bay, N.S., Guelph, Ont., and Welland, Ont.

His passion for Jewish learning led him to perform many services for the elderly as a volunteer telling Yiddish stories and performing Hebrew and liturgical songs. He was recently honoured for more than 2,000 hours of service at Baycrest.

He is survived by his wife Miriam, sons Leslie and his wife Annette; Murray and his wife Margo; daughter Lilian; seven grandchildren, and seven great-grandchildren.

CJN staffer really was a renaissance man

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It's almost trite to call anyone who is even remotely interesting a renaissance man (or woman).

But I and my colleagues at The Canadian Jewish News had the good luck to actually know such a person.

Eric Layman

In the confines of the newspaper office, Eric Layman, who died suddenly last week, was a sales representative, writer and proofreader at The CJN, where he had worked since 1974.

Outside, in what he probably considered the "real world," he was a poet, a creator of science fiction worlds, a thinker, a teacher and a songwriter.

He would arrive at the office – to which he often bicycled in all kinds of weather – dressed in either a beret, set at a jaunty angle, or a squashed hat and a long scarf.

Eric was one of those people who always had something to talk about. Current events. The language he invented for his Star Trek-inspired stories - complete with pronunciation, grammar and sociological justification. The poetry workshops and readings that he both attended and gave. His relationships.

He wanted to know all he could about the history of things and people and places and religions.

But it would be wrong to suggest that Eric was only interested in his own pursuits. He wanted to know all about other peoples' experiences – the good things and the bad. And he remembered things you told him long after you said them.

When a friend once asked him to come to visit her classes of special needs children, he quickly agreed. They adored him and kept asking when he was coming back.

In many ways, Eric was a throwback to hippie times in the 1960s, when he used to sell his poetry on the streets of Yorkville. Not for him the suit and tie, or the downtown condo. Oh, he lived downtown all right – in an apartment in the heart of Kensington Market.

Every so often, he and I would be scolded for getting so engrossed in a conversation that we would disturb the people around us.

It will be quieter in the CJN offices now. He will be missed.

ALL I NEED OF HEAVEN

I'll know life's joys to overflow; far sooner flames than rust.
Before I go, I'll share what I know, though the womb reclaim my dust.

I'll leave a little joy behind me;
this is my final wish.
This is all I need of heaven,
and no post-mortem bliss.

Let the words I write, inspire, blades in freedom's hand,
birds of bright desire,
and rain to a greening land.

I'll leave the world a little freer;
this is my final wish.
This is all I need of heaven,
and no post-mortem bliss.

In flesh and wind and weather,
in sinew, blood and stone,
I'm meshed with the world together,
yet one to myself alone.

I shall return where I came from;
my destiny is this.
This is all I need of heaven,
and no post-mortem bliss.

In the wombs of stars compounded, the elements burn and birth.
As our galaxy's wheel swings round,
we shall return from earth.

From stardust back to stardust,
our destiny is this.
This is all we need of heaven,
and no post-mortem bliss.

Coke urged to compensate Montreal family

MONTREAL — The Zionist Organization of America (ZOA) held a protest outside the Coca- Cola Company's recent annual shareholders' meeting in Wilmington, Del., calling on the multi-billion dollar company to compensate the Bigio family of Montreal, Egyptian Jewish refugees whose land and factories were expropriated by the Egyptian government during an anti-Semitic campaign in the 1960s.

In 1994, Coke bought a minority interest in the El Nasr Bottling Company (ENBC), the Egyptian firm that took over the Bigios' seized property. Three years later, the family sued Coke for trespass in federal district court in New York.

"Coca-Cola continues to violate its own code of business conduct," said Leonard Getz, a national vice-president of ZOA and a Coca-Cola shareholder.

"First the company refuses to acknowledge that it is profiting from stolen property, and now it reneges on its promise to engage in good faith settlement discussions with the Bigios. What will it take for Coke to do the right thing?"

Last year, Getz submitted a shareholder proposal for consideration at Coca-Cola's annual shareholders' meeting, proposing that Coca-Cola be required to fairly compensate the Bigios for their loss. He said the company agreed at that time to negotiate with the Bigios.

This year, Getz was outside the shareholders' meeting, along with several dozen other protesters, displaying signs that read, "Who's Benefiting from Anti-Semitism? Coke is it!," "Coke Trespasses on Stolen Jewish Property," and Christians and Jews United for Justice Ask 'The Real Thing' To Do The Right Thing."

"The ZOA called off a demonstration last year after Coca-Cola promised to discuss settlement terms with the Bigio family. But after several meetings held during the past year, it is now abundantly clear that Coca-Cola has no intention of offering the Bigios a fair settlement," said ZOA national president Morton Klein.

In the 1960s, the Egyptian regime of Gamal Abdel Nasser expropriated the Bigio family's land and factories near Cairo without compensating them. The ZOA claims the only reason was that the Bigios were Jewish.

Soft drink giant has share in firm that took over seized land in Egypt

The Bigios had owned the property since the early 1900s. Coca-Cola had leased the land and a factory from the Bigios since the 1940s. The Bigios had a longstanding business relationship with Coca-Cola in Egypt, supplying bottle caps and other products to the company.

The New York federal district court dismissed the Bigios' case at Coca-Cola's request, concluding that Egypt was a more appropriate forum to decide their claims. The Bigios appealed, asking the ZOA to submit an amicus curiae ("friend of the court") brief on their behalf.

The ZOA's brief showed that the Bigios would not get a fair trial in Egypt because hatred of Jews is deeply ingrained in Egyptian society, and that this hatred is still fostered today, even by the government-sponsored media.

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed the federal district court ruling last year, and decided that the Bigios' case could proceed in an American court, saying, "It was perfectly reasonable under these circumstances for the plaintiffs to bring their action against Coca-Cola, the only U.S. company involved, in the United States."

The ZOA has been actively supporting the Bigios' cause and has called for a boycott of Coca-Cola products until the company makes a fair settlement with the Bigio family.

"Despite its self-image and promise to act with honesty and integrity in all matters, Coca-Cola has been unfairly and immorally benefiting from the campaign of anti-Semitism against the Bigios," said Susan Tuchman, director of the ZOA's Centre for Law and Justice.

The Bigios are represented by Washington, D.C., attorneys Nathan and Alyza Lewin, who successfully argued before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit that the Bigios were entitled to proceed with their claims in an American court.

Raphael Bigio, 63, speaking on behalf of his family, said he is deeply grateful for the ZOA's assistance. He hopes that Jews and other "fair-minded" people will stop buying Coke products.

"As Coca-Cola well knows, my family owns these valuable assets in Egypt, and they were stolen from us. You can't go and buy stolen assets and then reap the benefits. It is only right that my family be compensated because of Coca-Cola's using and benefiting from my family's property in Egypt."

Klein added: "This case is important for several reasons. First, it seeks to right a shameful wrong committed by Coca-Cola. Second, it's a reminder of the billions of dollars worth of assets, businesses, homes, etc., stolen from Jews in Arab countries.

"And finally, the case is a reminder of the close to one million Jewish refugees who suffered in the Arab and Islamic countries in which they lived. Israel and the Jewish community must demand full and fair compensation for their losses."

Coke spokesperson Crystal Warwell Walker said the company is not commenting as this is a matter of ongoing litigation.

She reissued an earlier statement, which reads in part: "Prior to submission of the bid for the purchase of the Egyptian bottler by a Coca-Cola Company subsidiary, a due diligence investigation was conducted. The investigation did not reveal any pending claims by the Bigios against ENBC."

Downtown Ottawa shul marks 50 years

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — At a time when many cities are seeing the demise of synagogues in their downtown cores as Jews continue their migration to the suburbs, Congregation Beth Shalom is bucking the trend.

Located in Ottawa's downtown Sandy Hill neighbourhood, the Beth Shalom will be celebrating its 50th anniversary with an "Evening of Bubbles & Bites," June 18 at the shul.

"Besides celebrating the 50th anniversary of the synagogue, the evening is also an opportunity to celebrate its rebirth and renewal, a coming alive again with a new vibrancy," she said, noting that although over the years many families have moved away from the downtown core, there are young couples and families moving into the area and joining Beth Shalom.

There have, of course, been challenges and changes along the way for the formerly Orthodox and currently unaffiliated Beth Shalom.

By 2002, after much of Ottawa's Jewish community had moved out to the suburbs, the congregation had shrunk to about 400 member families, about half the number it had 25 years earlier.

In an effort to attract new members, in 2003, two-thirds of Beth Shalom's members voted to secede from the Orthodox Union and introduce mixed seating in the sanctuary. The shul also decided to allow bat mitzvah girls to read haftarot – though not to read from the Torah – but it retained its Orthodox liturgy and kashruth standards.

The changes led to the resignation of the shul's chazzan and rabbi, and about 40 to 50 people split off to form a new downtown minyan that eventually became the Orthodox Community Ohev Yisroel.

Membership now stands at about 400 families and is growing, said parnass Allan Baker.

The June 18 celebratory evening will have a number of nostalgic components.

A documentary video tracing the shul's history is being prepared by a committee under the leadership of shul member and former CBC reporter Jason Moscovitz. The video will feature interviews with congregants sharing their favourite stories of bygone eras.

Pictures are also being gathered for a "walk down memory lane" display of storyboards to be mounted in the foyer, which guests will enjoy while meeting old friends during the opening reception.

Other highlights of the evening will be a tribute to Issie Rose, "a stalwart member and fixture in the life of Beth Shalom," said Alyce Baker, whose family has also been involved with the synagogue over the decades. There will also be a ceremony honouring the founding members of the synagogue, many of whom are still active and will be present that evening.

There will be music from the five decades of the synagogue's existence, and a cocktail reception will feature food kiosks with delicacies from each decade.

Organizers are hoping that many former Ottawans will come "home" to join in the celebration.

Tickets are available through the synagogue office at 613-789-3501, ext. 223, and the cost, following the theme of the evening, is $57.17, commemorating the year on the Jewish calendar that Beth Shalom was founded.

Ex-Mossad agent tells amazing story over matzah

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — It's not so unusual that Michael Ross, who grew up in Victoria, B.C., has returned to live there with his second wife and child after spending most of his adult life elsewhere.

The unusual part of his story is where the "elsewhere" was.

In his youth, while backpacking through Europe, a chance encounter led Ross to make a side trip to Israel. What was intended as a brief adventure turned into a sojourn of nearly two decades, and what happened during that time is now the subject of a book and a film about to begin production.

Ross' recounted his story — as told in his book The Volunteer: A Canadian's Secret Life in the Mossad, written by Ross and National Post columnist Jonathan Kay—at a recent Passover lunch, held April 24 at Ottawa's Agudath Israel Congregation and sponsored by the Ottawa chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU).

When he arrived in Israel in 1982, Ross had no idea that within two years he would convert to Judaism, marry an Israeli woman and live on a kibbutz, as well as become an Israeli citizen and join the Israeli Defence Forces.

For various reasons – perhaps because of his non-Jewish background, native English-speaking ability, and previous experience in the Canadian military – he was recruited into the Mossad, Israel's spy agency, following his regular military service.

Staring down the barrel of Iran's nuclear gun

As Israel approaches its 60th anniversary, many in the media are looking at the danger that Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons poses to the very survival of the Jewish state.

For instance, in the May/June issue of Foreign Policy magazine, the sensationally titled cover story "The Israel Myth," by Israeli writer Gershon Gorenberg, states categorically that a nuclear Iran would not destroy Israel.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Gorenberg's argument is that Iran's nuclear ambitions can be deterred by Israel's presumed stockpile of nuclear weapons, just as the leaders of the former Soviet Union were deterred by the threat of nuclear retaliation by the United States.

Gorenberg writes: "Experience shows... that Iranian leaders share the Soviets' caution. Iran agreed to a ceasefire in the war with Iraq once Iraqi missiles began falling on Tehran. The ayatollahs were willing to sacrifice soldiers [and tens of thousands of children] – but not to pay a higher price."

Gorenberg's self-consciously clever summary: "The threat of mushroom clouds will concentrate [Iran's] thinking about Israel wonderfully."

But, as most Israeli and a large number of western analysts agree, Israel can't afford to sit still and allow Iran to produce nuclear weapons on the assumption that Iran would never be so irrational as to use them.

Even Gorenberg acknowledges that if Iran acquires nuclear weapons, it could set off a regional race for the bomb and increase dramatically the risk of "a mistake." He fails, however, to mention the other looming possibility: that a nuclear Iran could place such weapons in the hands of its terrorist proxies, such as Hezbollah.

The Economist's special report on "Israel at 60" (April 3) said: "Within the Israeli government, secret debates rage over whether, and when, Israel should strike Iran alone. Outside it, squadrons of ex-spooks and retired generals hold conferences on the future of a polynuclear Middle East. Soothing voices counsel that for all the inflammatory statements about wiping Israel off the map, Iran wants a bomb for national pride and self defence, not unprovoked aggression.

Will deterrence stave off the threat?

"But in a country obsessed with security, the hawks tend to have more sway."

The Economist quoted Shmuel Bar, a former Mossad agent and now an Iran expert at Herzliya's Interdisciplinary Center, as an example of a "hawk" who rejects the idea that the Cold War model of deterrence would work in the Middle East.

Bar responded in an April 26 letter to the Economist in which he rebuked the magazine for minimizing Israel's concerns about a nuclear Iran: "Israel has little choice but to view the Iranian threat through the prism of the past 60 years in the region and take into account the record of brinkmanship by regional leaders seeking to enhance their public support, popular enthusiasm for nuclear weapons, and the strong influence of religious beliefs that sanctify risk propensity and martyrdom. These do not augur well for a stable Middle East."

In other words, no one should assume that Iran's clique of mullahs, led by Supreme Leader Ayatollah Khamenei, will act according to western rational calculations.

As Jerusalem Post editor David Horovitz wrote in "Stopping Iran" (April 24): "The combination of Iran's incitement to genocide and its determined acquisition of the tools to carry out the deed has created a consensus in leadership here [in Israel] – not absolute unanimity, but certainly a strong majority view – that Israel's future well-being necessitates the thwarting of this Iranian regime's nuclear aspirations."

Congress, First Nations group putting Ahenakew behind them

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Representatives of First Nations and Jewish organizations who met in Ottawa last week are touting the goodwill and co-operative spirit of the meeting and downplaying any lingering after effects of the David Ahenakew affair.

Chief Lawrence Joseph of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations (FSIN) said contrary to some media reports, there are no "strained relations" with the Jewish community.

"I have never expressed or experienced anything but good relations with the Jewish community," Joseph told The CJN.

"Ahenakew is an individual and he does not represent the 74 First Nations organizations that I do.

"He's an individual who made a horrendous mistake and he doesn't reflect the character of all the First Nations people," he said. "We 100 per cent condemn it."

Co-operative spirit cited at joint meeting

Ahenakew, a former leader of the FSIN and the Assembly of First Nations, was charged with promoting hatred of Jews after he told a reporter covering a FSIN health conference that Jews were a disease and Hitler was justified in killing them.

A trial court found him guilty, but the conviction was overturned on appeal and a new trial ordered.

The retrial is scheduled to begin in the fall, but about a month ago, the FSIN reportedly reinstated Ahenakew to the position with the FSIN senate that he lost after his comments were reported.

Ahenakew turned down the seat after federal and provincial ministers threatened to reconsider their support of the FSIN.

Joseph said the FSIN never reinstated Ahenakew but only had been asked to take the first step in that direction. (News reports at the time stated the FSIN legislative assembly held a closed-door meeting in which it voted 43-3 to reinstate Ahenakew.)

Joseph said the FSIN will follow a clearer and more transparent voting process in any future bid to reinstate Ahenakew.

He said the meeting with Canadian Jewish Congress and Saskatchewan Jewish community leaders was a first step toward fostering closer ties between the two communities. Part of their discussion focused on putting in place an arrangement that would allow Ahenakew to demonstrate that he has truly repented for his remarks, Joseph said.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber, who attended the 2½ hour meeting last week, said much of the discussion focused on ways the two organizations could address issues of common concern.

Native treaty rights and the residential schools scandal are two issues where the organization could co-operate, Farber said.

Discussion of the Ahenakew issue "proved more challenging," he continued. "They wanted us to understand their tradition on forgiveness and redemption. We have a tradition in Judaism on that," he said.

"They wanted us to understand their position. At the same time, we wanted them to understand our position."

"Now we have a starting point to work towards that goal… We are far from any conclusion here, but we are on the road to dialogue."

Farber said the meeting was "frank, passionate and challenging, and in the end, both [sides] came away with a better understanding of each other."

He said Congress has accepted a FSIN invitation to visit Saskatchewan reserves sometime in the summer to see first hand the conditions Saskatchewan Indians face.

Although contact with the FSIN is a recent development, Congress has for 10 years pursued closer ties with First Nations, Farber said.

When asked whether he was concerned about divulging Mossad secrets, Ross said he has the utmost respect for the organization and wouldn't do anything to imperil it.

"[The book] is a personal story, not a smear of the Mossad," he said. "There are people in this country and in Europe who owe their lives to the Mossad. Much of its intelligence has been used by, and helps, other countries. Pretty much everything I have described in my book can be found on the Internet or in another book."

Ross related some of the experiences he had while working undercover for the Mossad, such as his mission to help the Jews of Zimbabwe escape when President Robert Mugabe started to seize the farms of whites in 2000 and also "targeted the Jewish community there… My job was to meet with members of the Jewish community there and help people to escape, to recruit people to help us. Time was of the essence."

There were complications along the way, including a hair-raising roadblock that was set up to find arms smugglers.

"During this period, I decided I had pretty much had enough of living that kind of life," Ross said. "This kind of work can take its toll on you, professionally and personally… Your cover life starts to take over your real life. When someone reaches that point, usually you have to go back to Israel and get yourself re-aligned."

Diagnosed right before Rosh Hashanah, treatment started on Erev Yom Kippur

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Marc Ginsburg, 33, has wanted to become a doctor since he was 10 years old.

After getting a master's degree as a nurse practitioner from the University of Toronto and completing two out of four years of medical school abroad, Ginsburg was shocked to find himself at the other end of the stethoscope.

While studying for an exam last summer, he fell ill and discovered that he had cancer.

Ginsburg began his career in health care at Mount Sinai Hospital in cardiology, where he became one of the charge nurses and worked in the Intensive Care Unit.

He was working to obtain his master's degree at the University of Toronto to become a nurse practitioner when he was accepted to medical school abroad.

"At that point, I had applied to medical school six years in a row. I didn't get accepted anywhere in Canada for those six years. And I applied everywhere. I always said seven years would be my cut off, so thank God," said Ginsburg, who is Orthodox.

With his wife, Gillian, six months pregnant, Ginsburg travelled to Bulgaria for his first year at the Medical University of Varna.

And with a newborn son, the Ginsburg family transferred to the University of Sint Eustatius School of Medicine in the Caribbean for his second year. At both schools, Ginsburg was at the top of his class.

In August 2007, he returned to Toronto and began to prepare for the United States Medical Licensing Exams, of which there are three.

"So I'm studying for the step one exam, and after about 2½ to three weeks of studying… I had a weird chest discomfort, a little difficulty swallowing… I thought it was school-related stress getting close to the end, and I didn't fit the age group for anything sinister," he said.

"I don't drink, don't smoke, I'm generally a very healthy person and a very active person. My nails turned white, I was short of breath," he said, adding that it all seemed to happen at once.

He said he went to see a friend who is a family physician. His blood was drawn, and it was discovered that Ginsburg's hemoglobin, the protein molecule in red blood cells that carries oxygen from the lungs, was extremely low.

"I got myself to North York General, they gave me two transfusions of blood and then they did more testing."

Doctors discovered that he had a tumour on the lower end of his esophagus where it meets with the stomach – the gastroesophageal junction. Ginsburg was diagnosed with adenocarsinoma.

"Something like less than 1.6 or 2 in a million people get what I get at this age. A cancer like this usually hits people in their 60s and over, and they are generally smokers, drinkers, obese…"

He said that while he sought specialists to join his treatment team, he met some resistance and pessimism.

He said a specialist at Princess Margaret Hospital, "basically wanted to put nails in a wooden box, so to speak."

But his oncologist at North York General Hospital was eager to start him on an 84-day chemotherapy cycle.

He said that same day, his wife, who was nine months pregnant with their second child, had gone into labour at Mount Sinai Hopital.

"I heard Miriam being born over the phone… It was just unbelievable."

After Ginsburg completed his 84-day cycle, his oncologist decided to extend his chemotherapy to 27 weeks because he was responding so well.

During his second-last CT scan, two of the radiologists who were friends with Ginsburg, said they were shocked by the result.

"In terms of how things looked and how things are now, it is nothing short of miraculous. The metastases, the lymph nodes that were affected have calcified and shrunken down. Our two friends who are radiologists at North York looked at it and said, 'If we didn't know where the primary tumour site was, we wouldn't even know where to begin to look.'"

It's been six weeks since the treatment ended, and since then, Ginsburg and his wife, who is an engineer, have been doing their own research into therapeutic treatments.

"With my background, I've been drawing on the biochemistry and immunology associated with supplements and putting myself on a regiment as well."

He said he also consulted with the naturopathic college across the street from the hospital to get confirmation that he is doing the right thing.

"On the Jewish side of things, we do our usual – pray three times a day, tfillin, mitzvot, we've visited many different rabbis. Gill's cousin is Rabbi Ya'acov Hillel, who is one of the foremost authorities on Kabbalah in the world, and he does the legitimate, legitimate stuff," Ginsburg said.

"He said, 'Just pray, have your faith, keep your emunah and do what you have to do.'"

Ginsburg, who is shomer Shabbat and shomer Mitzvot, said the rabbis he met with instructed him to be even more observant than he already was, light a candle everyday in honour of a late rabbi, and give tzedekah every day in an amount equivalent to the gematriah of his Hebrew name.

"All of these rabbinical discussions happened right before I started doing chemotherapy," he said.

He recalled being encouraged to change his Hebrew name to Chaim.

He said that Rabbi Hillel had organized two minyanim in his honour in Israel, and just as the rabbi called to inform his wife that his name had been changed to Chaim, Ginsburg was on his way home after having just purchased a complete set of the Talmud.

"People will go a whole lifetime and not get a fraction of these messages," he said.

Now that he is in remission, his latest battle involves being accepted for a transfer into a Canadian medical school that is close enough to home.

"My followup is here in Toronto, my treatment is here in Toronto. Any other treatment that is going to be done, will be done at [Princess Margaret Hospital]."

Despite being rejected by schools including U of T, where he obtained his master's degree as a nurse practitioner, he is still waiting to hear from others.

"They say because you went to school outside of Canada, we can't really account for the weight of your education and what is the comparability to that to your peers," he said.

"What they're failing to see is that I'm a nurse practitioner from the school of graduate studies from the faculty of nursing and I was trained by their physicians and even one of the former deans has come to my support… I'm just trying to catch a break, you know?"

He said he was even willing to be accepted on a probationary basis or even go back a year.

Ginsburg has met obstacle after obstacle, yet he refuses to give up on his dream.

"You don't cave in and lose your faith. That's what being Jewish is all about. That's what being human is all about. That is the triumph of the human spirit… I want to be a doctor more than anything."

Ginsburg, frustrated, said that if it all went as planned, he'd be applying for his residency, rather than fighting to be accepted by a Canadian medical school.

"But there's a blessing in everything," his wife said. "Now you get to spend more time with the kids."

"That I wouldn't change for anything," he said.

Toothbrushes approved for Shabbat use

One particular invention, their bug checker – a light to inspect fresh vegetables for potential insects – had to be made brighter, after a request came from the Union of Orthodox Rabbis, which used the prototype. The possibility of treif – consuming an insect via produce – has become more of a hot button issue in recent years.

Some of the products that the Veffers sell include special toothbrushes and dental wash approved for use on Shabbat.

According to various opinions held by communities and rabbis, regular toothbrushes use nylon bristles that are so densely packed and thin that wringing out water is inevitable, and this is a Sabbath prohibition. To solve this problem, Kosher Innovations created a brush with wide-spaced, thick rubber bristles.

Rabbi Veffer said he is particularly excited about the new bathroom tissue that you need not tear. Its dispenser contains pre-cut folded tissues.

One of the newer products available from Kosher Innovations is the Shabbat alarm clock, which automatically shuts off by itself after a minute, without the need to press any buttons. The clock is equipped with five alarms, so it can be set for multiple naps and wake-up times over the course of a day.

The Magnetic Shabbos Message Board is the halachically approved way to leave fridge notes to the family on Shabbat or Yom Tov, when writing is not allowed. The message board comes with more than 150 colourful magnets, with words, pictures and phrases common to the typical Jewish household.

"These are items that help people feel better about the commitments they made in terms of Jewish practice," Chana Veffer said.

"We were starved in Auschwitz, and to alleviate our numerous hunger pangs we invented frequent 'dream meals' ranging between coffee klatches, luncheons, informal and formal dinner parties. This may sound delusional I know, but during these meal planning sessions, we were briefly transported to a normal world, a world that was so far from our miserable reality." – Lillian Berliner, New York

This is just one of the many touching excerpts from the stories and recipes found in The Holocaust Survivor Cookbook, now in its second printing. My friend Dalia Carmel of New York told me about the book when I called her a few weeks ago.

She said, "Although the recipes are not thoroughly edited, this is such an important book and it deserves to be on cookbook shelves everywhere."

I then contacted Joanne Caras of Port St. Lucie, Fla., who has worked tirelessly over the past two years to collect recipes and stories from Holocaust survivors, compiling them into this unforgettable book. It contains "129 miracles, 250 great recipes," along with many photos of Holocaust survivors and their families.

Caras told me: "We asked Holocaust survivors to send us their favourite recipe, photos, and also the story of how they were able to survive the Holocaust. We collected 129 stories from all over the world, including Europe, South America, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, Israel, and many US states. Each one is a miracle!

"In the introduction to our cookbook, we ask each person who cooks one of the recipes to also read to their family the story that comes with it. That way, not only will we preserve the recipes, but more importantly, we will help to insure that the stories of these brave survivors will live on for generations to come."

The Holocaust Survivor Cookbook is different from most typical cookbooks, which are organized into sections – appetizers, salads, soups, main courses, side dishes, desserts, etc. Since many of the survivors submitted more than one recipe, the recipes were kept together, even though they might run the entire gamut of categories. So you may find one page with a soup and a dessert recipe side by side. There is a recipe index where you will find the recipes listed by categories and page numbers. There is also a list of survivors and their stories.

Cookbooks can be purchased at the retail price for personal use, or they can be purchased in large quantities at the wholesale price by groups who want to sell them to their members as a fundraiser.

Proceeds from every cookbook sold will benefit Carmei Ha'ir in Jerusalem, the soup kitchen where Caras' son and daughter-in-law volunteer, serving more than 500 meals each day to poor and hungry Israelis. Those who can afford to pay do so, and those who can't afford it, don't. The money is collected after meals in a tzedakah box near the door.

NANA'S KUGEL

2 packages wide noodles
6 brown farm eggs
1¼ cups sugar
1 tsp salt
½ tsp. cinnamon
1½ sticks butter (¾ cup regular salted butter)
1 small can crushed pineapple/and raisins (optional)
1 tbsp. vanilla extract
24 oz. creamed small curd cottage cheese
1 pint sour cream
8 oz. package cream cheese

Preheat oven to 350. Boil 2 packages of wide egg noodles until tender; drain and set aside.

Grease a large Pyrex baking dish (about 15x10x2-inches – 4 quarts).

Combine all ingredients in a large mixing bowl and add cooked noodles, mixing until ready to pour into baking dish. Dot with butter and sprinkle with cinnamon and sugar. Bake for 1½ hours.

MA'S FAMOUS COOKIES

⅔ cup oil
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla
2½ cups flour
1 tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. cream of tartar
½ tsp. salt
cinnamon sugar (and/or jam like raspberry or strawberry or apricot, etc., if desired)

Preheat oven to 375. Beat oil with sugar. Blend in eggs and vanilla. Stir in dry ingredients. Drop from a teaspoon onto a lightly greased baking sheet. Sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon and/or a variety of jams. Bake at 375 for 10 minutes, or until golden brown.

Many touching tributes found in cookbook

"Our goal is to raise $1 million for Carmei Ha'ir, and millions more for Jewish groups all over the world," Caras said. "In total, we would like to raise $6 million as a tribute to the memory of those Jews who did not survive the Holocaust.

"Right now the demand is so overwhelming that we had to order more cookbooks from our printer. We have shipped cookbooks from Florida to Canada, New York to California, and all over the world. We have touched the hearts of thousands of people."

The Holocaust Survivor Cookbook can be ordered wholesale or retail by going to the website www.survivorcookbook.org, or you can contact Caras at 443-604-2643.

The following story was just one of many touching tributes found in the book. It was submitted by Carol Master about her late mother-in-law, Henna Master of Montreal, along with two recipes from Carol's collection.

Carol Master wrote: "My father-in-law, Ralph, came to Montreal, Quebec, Canada in 1936, and my mother-in-law followed in 1938. Both were born and grew up in Lublin, Poland. The Pa, as we called him, had two sisters that never made it out, his Dad died at an early age and his mother perished in the camps with his two sisters. His brothers Moshe got out earlier and Maurice followed later after escaping Poland through Portugal, Belgium and ultimately England.

"My Ma had two brothers who never made it along with her folks. Her sister Golda survived the camps. Golda came home with numbers on her arm telling how she had to watch her husband and son being burnt alive, while she was tied up.

"My father-in-law's brother Moshe, who was a reverend and cantor in Montreal, brought my Pa over to be a choirmaster… Their name was Gelibter, and somehow Master remained, as that's what the officials heard… My Ma was allowed to come because my Pa was going to marry her… and 'the Master Family' came to be.

"My late mother-in-law Henna Master was a wonderful cook. Even her husband helped her, another survivor, to make Shabbat every Friday night even in a Montreal blizzard. I learned all my mamaloshen from her, a little Yiddish, and about family.

"She had riches in her baby's smiles… if she knew all her children and grandchildren were well and happy… then she was content. When I married her golden son Eli, I soon after asked her for her recipe for her marvelous cookies that her kids and friends would anxiously wait for. Well, she said all the ingredients, and off I went to bake. I put it all together in a bowl, however the mixture seemed very loose. Then I put the cookies in the oven and when I opened it to check – you guessed it, a giant puddle.

"I immediately phoned my Ma. 'So,' she said, 'tell me what you put in.' I read her back her recipe and she then said 'So where's the flour?' I said you never mentioned flour. 'How can you make cookies without flour?' Being that I'd never baked before, I didn't know that flour was not necessary to tell because I should know that. Between all the great aromas, tastes and laughter, I became a great cook, and I'd like to share what my grandchildren love me to make."

Chocolate chips — more than just cookies

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

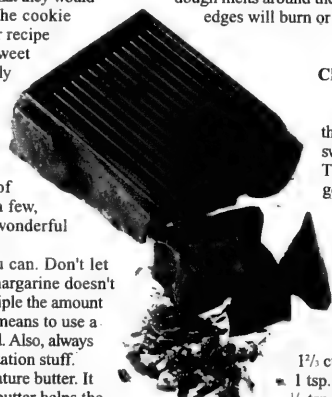
Back in the 1930s a woman named Ruth Wakefield decided to put small bits of a semi-sweet chocolate bar in her cookies with the idea that they would melt. Sad to say, it didn't melt, but the cookie became so popular that Nestlé put her recipe on the back wrapper of their semi-sweet chocolate bar. Ruth got a lifetime's supply of chocolate. Not a bad deal for them or us.

Obviously, chocolate chip cookies are one of the most popular uses for semi-sweet/milk chocolate chips and contrary to the recipes on the back of most bags of chips I think there are a few, little-known tricks to making really wonderful chocolate chip cookies

First, always use real butter if you can. Don't let anyone convince you that butter vs. margarine doesn't make any difference. It does. Second, triple the amount of vanilla extract recommended. This means to use a tablespoon where a teaspoon is specified. Also, always use real vanilla extract and not the imitation stuff.

Use melted butter not room temperature butter. It makes a big difference. Using melted butter helps the dissolving and melting of the sugar, improving the consistency of the dough as you are working with it, and also improving the texture of the cookies after they are baked. I also like to add my brown sugar to the butter as it's melting. Fourth, add a little milk, maybe just a tablespoon or two, when you are mixing the dough. This will make it less stiff and the cookies will be less hard and crunchy when they are done. Refrigerate the dough for at least 1 hour before cooking it.

Make sure the cookie sheet is room temperature or cooler when you put the dough on it and put it into the oven. If the dough melts around the edges before it starts to bake, the edges will burn or get too brown.



CHOCOLATE CHOCOLATE CHIP MUFFINS

Truly a chocolate-lover's dream, these muffins are made with semi-sweet chocolate and chocolate chips. They freeze well, but they will be gone before you know it.

1/3 cup unsalted butter
3/4 cup buttermilk
1/2 cup white sugar
1 egg
1 1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
1 2/3 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup mini semi-sweet chocolate chips

Preheat the oven to 400. Line 12 muffin cups with papers. In a small saucepan over low heat, melt the semi-sweet chocolate together with the butter. Let stand until cooled, about 10 minutes. Lightly beat the egg. In a small bowl, stir together the chocolate-butter mixture with the buttermilk, sugar, egg, and vanilla, until blended well. In a large bowl, stir together flour, soda, and salt. Make a hole in the center of the dry ingredients, pour in the chocolate mixture, and stir until just combined. Stir in the mini chocolate chips. Spoon the batter into the lined muffin cups.

Bake for 20-25 minutes or until a toothpick inserted in the center of a muffin comes out clean. Remove muffin tin from oven and let stand at least 5 minutes, before removing the muffins and letting them cool on a wire rack. Serve warm or cooled; can be frozen as well. Makes 12.

CHOCOLATE CHIP PANCAKES

1/2 to 3/4 cups milk
2 tbsp. melted butter
1 egg
1 cup all purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
2 tbsp. sugar
1/2 tsp. salt
3/4 cup mini chocolate chips
butter, for oiling pan

In a medium bowl, whisk milk, melted butter and egg lightly until incorporated. Sift flour, baking powder, sugar, and salt into bowl with egg and milk mixture. Mix the batter just until combined; do not over work batter. Add chocolate chips. Heat a large nonstick sauté pan, wipe down with butter. Spoon the batter into the pan making the pancakes. Cook in the pan until the cake is golden brown on the bottom and full of bubbles on top. With a spatula turn the cake over to brown other side. Serve warm with sweet butter. Makes 6 to 8 pancakes.

Iran rejects tough atomic inspections

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran on Monday ruled out accepting intrusive nuclear inspections unless there was an end to "double standards" on global non-proliferation that it said benefited nuclear arms powers, which allegedly includes Israel.

Squaring off with western nations at a global meeting on how to shore up the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) Iran rejected allegations of covert Iranian atom bomb work and blamed nuclear weapons powers for the treaty's problems.

Iranian Ambassador Ali Asghar Soltanieh asked why developing nations should accept intrusive International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspections as a condition for obtaining nuclear know-how when nuclear arms powers could unilaterally curb IAEA checks of their facilities.

Soltanieh accused industrialized powers of enshrining "nuclear apartheid" by imposing harsher export controls for developing states within the NPT while secretly helping non-NPT state Israel build a nuclear arsenal.

"This double standard cannot be sustained, and no additional measure in strengthening [IAEA] safeguards can be accepted by non-nuclear weapons parties unless these serious constraints and discrimination are removed," he said.

Earlier Monday, Iran ruled out halting its disputed nuclear work, saying it would reject any incentive package offered by world powers that violated the Islamic Republic's nuclear rights.

Double standard cited

Six world powers agreed at a meeting in London on Friday to offer a new incentives package to coax Iran to suspend uranium enrichment, a process that the West believes Tehran wants to master so that it can build nuclear weapons.

Iran, which insists its nuclear program is aimed at generating electricity, says enrichment is a national right that it will not give up.

"Those incentives that violate the Iranian nation's right in any form will not be reviewed by the Islamic state," Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mohammad Ali Hosseini told a news conference Monday.

Iran's English-language Press TV earlier translated Hosseini as saying incentives violating Iran's rights would "not be supported by us". It said Iran had not officially received any package.

The five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council – the United States, France, Britain, China and Russia – and Germany, known as the P5+1, offered a package to Iran in 2006 that demanded Iran halt enrichment. Tehran rejected it.

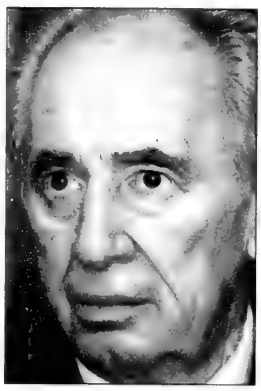
"Regarding the incentives package ... we believe the path adopted in the past should not be continued. They should act based on realities and international regulations. Talks should be held based on respecting nations' rights," Hosseini said.

Russia, which sent an envoy to Iran last week for discussions that covered the nuclear row, said on Saturday that enrichment would have to be suspended during international talks aimed at resolving the dispute.

The UN Security Council has demanded that Iran stop uranium enrichment. Tehran's refusal has led to three sets of limited sanctions since 2006.

Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said on Sunday the Islamic Republic would not give up its right in the face of western pressure, but did not explicitly mention nuclear work.

In related news, Israeli President Shimon Peres on Monday said that while he was not in favour of attacking Iran over its nuclear program, a strong alliance needed to be put in place to sanction the Islamic country to deter it from its atomic path.



Israeli President Shimon Peres

"I am not in favour of a military attack on Iran, but we must quickly and decisively establish a strong, aggressive coalition of nations that will impose painful economic sanctions on Iran," he said.

Addressing a press conference of foreign journalists, in Israel for the country's 60th anniversary celebrations, Peres said that "Iran's efforts to achieve nuclear weapons should keep the entire world from sleeping soundly.

"[Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad is calling for Israel to be wiped off the map, and the combination of nuclear weapons in the hands of a deranged extremist religious leader is a nightmare for the world.

"In a way, it's more complicated than in the time of the Nazis," he said. "Hitler didn't have a nuclear bomb."

The president also said that Iran is a global terror centre that "trains and finances generations of killers and terrorists."

On the topic of Hamas, Peres said that the militant rulers of the Gaza Strip are standing in the way of Palestinian statehood.

"If it weren't for Hamas and their criminal behaviour, the Palestinian people would have had an independent state a long time ago," he said.

The president added that talking to the Islamic group was like "talking to a wall."

"We mustn't forget that we evacuated the Gaza Strip and the areas surrounding it, all the while under Hamas fire aimed at women and children in Israel. We don't want to harm the civilian population – we transfer food, fuel and medicine to the Gaza population, but we can't ignore the fact that Hamas is causing much damage to their people and can blame no one but themselves."

In regard to Syria, Peres said that if the Syrians were earnestly ready to enter into peace talks with Israel, Israel would be willing to comply. "We want a comprehensive peace in the Middle East, and we are willing to pay a price for a comprehensive peace, as we have done in the past," he said.

16 Israeli civilians killed this year in terror acts, 1,634 since May, '48

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Sixteen Israeli civilians were killed in terrorist attacks in the first four months of the year, bringing the total of civilian terror-related deaths to 1,634 since the creation of the state 60 years ago, the National Insurance Institute's (NII) director general, Esther Dominissini, said Monday.

An official ceremony to commemorate victims of terror was to be held on Wednesday, Memorial Day, at the Mt. Herzl national cemetery.

Eight Israeli civilians were killed in 2007, and 133 wounded, in 87 terror-related incidents last year. Most of the injuries were incurred in Qassam rocket attacks, Dominissini said in a statement released by the NII.

A total of 14,000 people have been wounded in terrorist attacks over the past 60 years.

Israel Briefs

Police question Olmert

Police questioned Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert last Friday for 90 minutes under caution that he may face charges. The interrogation was leaked to the media before it took place. It's not clear what it concerned. Olmert has been questioned in recent years about a number of alleged crimes, including steering government contracts to friends and making illegal patronage appointments. None of the investigations have resulted in charges. The secretive nature of the questioning, the news that Olmert had been given just 48 hours warning, and the fact that the interrogation was "under caution" led to speculation police may be close to breaking one of the cases. Olmert must step down if he is indicted.

Inquiry clears troops

An army inquiry cleared Israeli troops in the killing of a family of five in the Gaza Strip. A blast on April 28 killed a Palestinian mother and her four children while they were preparing to eat breakfast in their home in Beit Hanoun. Palestinians blamed an Israeli missile strike. An army inquiry concluded an air-launched missile had hit its target, four gunmen who had been targeting Israeli troops, and that the missile hit no other targets. The gunmen were carrying backpacks loaded with weaponry, and the army theorized the family might have been killed in a blast caused when the missile hit a gunman's weaponry, or that the mother and her children were knocked down by the force of the second blast, or hit by debris.

PM meets Jordanian king

Ehud Olmert held unannounced talks on the Israeli-Palestinian peace process with Jordan's King Abdullah. The Israeli prime minister flew to Jordan last Wednesday to meet Abdullah, a key patron of efforts to bolster Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. The Israeli media quoted Abdullah as urging Olmert to ensure that his talks with Abbas lead to an accord on Palestinian statehood before U.S. President George W. Bush leaves office at year's end.

Schalit captor killed

An air strike killed a Palestinian terrorist who was involved in the abduction of Gilad Schalit. Nafez Mansour, a Hamas militiaman, was killed in the Gazan town of Rafah. Military officials said Mansour was involved in Schalit's abduction on the Gaza border in June 2006. Hamas vowed to avenge Mansour's killing, which came as Egypt tried to broker a ceasefire between Israel and armed Palestinian factions in Gaza.

From Berlin to London to Paris, Europe-Israel ties warming

By DINAH SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — When Israel asked for European troops, including Germans, to patrol the Israel-Lebanon border area following Israel's 2006 war with Hezbollah, it was a salient sign of how far European ties with Israel have come in recent years.

"Who would have ever thought that German soldiers would be charged – and trusted – to protect Israelis 65 years after the Holocaust?" observed Oded Eran, formerly Israel's ambassador to the European Union and now head of the World Jewish Congress office in Jerusalem.

The Germany-Israel bond was further underscored in March when German Chancellor Angela Merkel addressed the Israeli Knesset in German and held an unprecedented joint cabinet meeting with the Israeli government.

Across Europe, similar signs show the warming relations with Israel, at least on the political and institutional levels.

Earlier this month, Polish Prime Minister Donald Tusk visited Israel in what both sides deemed a turning point in bilateral relations since Poland became a democracy in 1990. Last October, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was received warmly in Britain when he visited 10 Downing St. And for the first time in 25 years, France has a president, Nicolas Sarkozy, keen on making the country's foreign policy friendlier toward Israel.

> 'I cannot recall a time when there has been such a positive flurry'

"I cannot recall a time when there has been such a positive flurry of diplomatic exchange between Israel and Europe," said Arye Mekel, a spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry.

Many diplomats and analysts say Europe-Israeli relations are in a new era of growing co-operation and understanding following years of mistrust and recrimination.

"Relations have improved and matured substantially in recent years," said Ran Curiel, Israel's ambassador to the 27-country European Union in Brussels.

The improvement in ties is a consequence of quietly enhanced economic cooperation, the European Union's expansion to include unabashedly pro-Israel countries from the former Eastern bloc such as Poland and the Czech Republic, and the replacement of the Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat with the more tractable Mahmoud Abbas as president of the Palestinian Authority.

Still, public opinion across Europe, according to polls and media reports, continues to cast Israel in an unfavourable light. This is evident in the negative media coverage of Israel during the Second Lebanon War in the summer of 2006, stepped-up criticism of Israel by European nongovernmental organizations, and ongoing British trade union calls for boycotts of Israeli goods and academics.

"The media and church institutions since 2000 have tended to adopt a position which suggests people don't support Israel's right to defend itself, which means they don't support its right to exist," said Robin Shepherd, a senior fellow at Chatham House, a London think tank.

"What is still missing is to correct the [public's] image of Israel," said the secretary-general of the European Jewish Congress, Serge Cwajgenbaum. "The image is still unbalanced."

On the governmental level, however, ties between Europe and Israel appear to be at a high point.

Some examples: European governments across the continent are holding celebrations for Israel's 60th birthday; Israel trusts Europe to train PA security forces and oversee the international funding of the Palestinian Authority; Germany plays a key role lobbying for European support for Israel; and the British government has proven to be a staunch ally of Israel, domestic criticism of its policy notwithstanding.

In recent years, Israel has gained many trade and aid benefits associated with EU membership due to the adoption in 2005 of the union's European Neighbourhood Policy. One-third of Israeli exports last year went to the European Union. Plans call for Israeli co-operation in the European space agency, and the sharing of intelligence is rising.

Such ties once were linked to Israeli progress in the peace process. That's no longer the case, Curiel says.

"You don't hear calls for sanctions against Israel anymore every time there is a disagreement about Israeli policy," he said.

This is a relatively new development. European politicians weaned on the milk of post-World War II rapprochement long have castigated Israeli military operations viewed by Israeli officials as vital to survival.

During the early years of the second intifadah, which began in 2000, EU External Affairs Minister Chris Patten consistently harangued Israeli leaders over the country's targeted assassinations of Palestinian terrorists, the West Bank security fence and Jewish settlement growth.

Europe wasn't always tilted against Israel. In the early years of the state, when Israel was seen as the underdog, it found friends and arms suppliers in Europe.

That changed following the 1967 Six-Day War.

"This is partly ideology, and partly oil, as Arabs were threatening to turn off the spigot," said Jonathan Rynhold, a professor of political science at Israel's Bar-Ilan University and a researcher at the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies.

Israeli-European discord worsened when Israel invaded Lebanon in 1982.

"Whatever is left of the image of plucky little democratic Israel, darling of the left, becomes to some the big bully Israel, the brutal occupying country," Rynhold said. "The first intifadah, starting in 1987, just magnifies this negative picture."

Hope emerged during myriad episodes of negotiations, but the collapse of the Oslo peace process and the second intifadah sent Israel-Europe ties to a new low.

In 2004, after the International Court of Justice at The Hague condemned the West Bank security fence, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told then-European Union Council Secretary-General Javier Solana that the court must think "Jewish blood is cheap."

Sharon also called the European Union, which had backed the court's conclusion, biased against Israel.

But the ensuing few years changed the tenor of the relationship significantly.

In 2004 and 2007, the European Union extended membership to 11 post-communist countries that are notably more pro-American and pro-Israel than older EU members. These countries, associating inaction with appeasement and noting their suffering under the Soviets, don't share Western Europe's aversion to Israeli military actions.

In Madrid in 2004 and in London the next year, deadly terrorist attacks by Islamic extremists gave European leaders a better sense of what Israel was facing.

Perhaps most important, Israel's disengagement from the Gaza Strip in 2005 dispelled the European conception that Israel is unwilling to make sacrifices for peace.

"Israel's formal acceptance of the two-state solution cemented a new, closer understanding between top-level Israeli and European politicians," Curiel said.

But many European politicians remain upset about Israeli settlement activity and Israel's treatment of the Palestinians, according to the vice-president of the European Parliament, Britain's Edward McMillon Scott.

"If Israel can pull out of Gaza, Israel can pull out of the occupied territories," he told JTA. "Yes, it is true there is more co-operation on the institutional level – call it normalization – but after the invasion of southern Lebanon, I think many of us thought Israel had lost its bearings."

Some other sticking points remain. The European Union refuses to label Lebanon"s Hezbollah a terrorist organization, EU funds go to anti-Israel nongovernmental organizations, and Israel wants Europe to do more to stop Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

Still, Israeli diplomats say, their concerns at least are being heard, even if they are not all being addressed.

IMPORTANT NOTICE / AVIS IMPORTANT

Government of Canada / Gouvernement du Canada

Reducing Canada's Immigration Backlog

The Government of Canada believes in immigration: we want more newcomers to join us, families to be re-unified faster and labour market demands to be met.

Currently, the immigration backlog sits at 925,000 applications. This means that the wait time for an application can be as long as six years.

That's why the Government of Canada is proposing measures to cut the wait.

These important measures, once in effect, include:

- More Resources: An additional $109 million to speed up the application process.
- Faster Processing Times: The ability to fast-track new applications.
- Better Employment Opportunities: Matching skills with our economic needs.
- Complete Processing: All applications currently in the backlog will be processed.

These measures are currently before Parliament.

All of these changes respect the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act.

Canada needs an immigration system that is flexible, fast and fair for everyone — that's why we're reducing the immigration backlog.

For more information on these changes please call 1 800 O-Canada (1-800-622-6232) TTY: 1-800-926-9105.

Réduire le nombre de demandes d'immigration en attente au Canada

Actuellement, le nombre de demandes d'immigration en attente se chiffre à 925 000. Cela se traduit par des délais de traitement pouvant atteindre six ans.

C'est pourquoi le gouvernement du Canada propose des mesures pour réduire l'attente.

- accroître les ressources : un montant supplémentaire de 109 millions de dollars pour accélérer le traitement des demandes;
- réduire les délais de traitement : la capacité d'accélérer le traitement des nouvelles demandes;
- améliorer les possibilités d'emploi : sélectionner des travailleurs qualifiés dont les compétences répondent à nos besoins économiques;
- traiter toutes les demandes : toutes les demandes déjà en attente seront traitées.

Le Canada a besoin d'un système d'immigration souple, rapide et équitable pour tous — c'est pour cette raison que nous réduisons le nombre de demandes d'immigration en attente.

You are an aspiring or experienced Jewish leader with a great interest in student advocacy, social action, engagement with Jewish traditions, and sustaining a vibrant Jewish community on campus. Your strong organizational and communication skills allow you to implement Hillel's mission to uphold a meaningful and pluralistic Jewish campus life. A motivated self-starter, you have a proven track record in volunteer and leadership development, informal Jewish and Zionist education and Israel advocacy, and have a strong knowledge of the issues facing Canadian Jewish university students.

You work well with a range of stakeholders. In this position you work closely with the Campus Advisory Board, students, lay leaders, the administration and staff at post-secondary institutions, and the local Jewish community. You promote Hillel as a body that is distinctively Jewish and universally human through setting strategic vision, leadership, and managerial oversight for the Ottawa Hillel activities that are the focal point for Jewish student life on campus. Specifically, you bring an energy and commitment to programming, Jewish learning opportunities, fiscal responsibility, organizing facilities for programs, and direction of volunteers, staff and administrators.

An advanced degree and demonstrated community leadership are desirable. Salary commensurate with experience. A job description is posted on the Jewish Federation of Ottawa website www.jewishottawa.com (see "About Us" then "Careers").

Candidates should submit by Thursday, May 22, 2008 a brief statement outlining your interests, and the skills, knowledge and experience which you bring to this position. The Federation thanks all who express interest in this position and advises that only those selected for interviews will be contacted. For more information or to apply please contact Audrey Kaplan akaplan@jewishottawa.com or tel 613-798-4696 ext 297.

1948...They Were There

'We volunteered because it was natural'

Waldston, 79, served with IDF in 1948

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

She has lived in Canada for the last 56 years, but this 79-year-old sabra still embodies the Israeli qualities that made her a pioneer who served in the nascent Israeli army during the Jewish state's War of Independence.

"Even today, I can lift you up and throw you over my shoulder," Shimona Waldston said with a laugh while describing the intense training she received in the army alongside her male peers.

Waldston was born in Tel Aviv in 1929, years after her father escaped the Russian Revolution in 1917.

"When my father came to Tel Aviv, it was sand dunes. There was nothing," said Waldston, who is the youngest of five children.

She said her entire family volunteered to help develop Israel, and through their involvement in their community, they helped lay the foundation for what the country is today.

Her two brothers were part of a group of eight men who established Kibbutz Hulata, which was on the border of Syria and Israel.

"My oldest brother was a member of Magen David Adom. He was a volunteer ambulance driver. He was the No. 1 blood donor, because he had O-negative blood."

She said she took part in a course he led through Magen David Adom to teach people first aid.

"He was a volunteer with all his heart," she said of her brother.

Her oldest sister, who was already married with children at the time, volunteered in the army, while her husband volunteered as a firefighter.

"Everything was volunteer at the time," she said.

Although Waldston couldn't join the army until she was 18, as a child, she was involved with many youth groups and was always eager to do her part.

"I think I was in high school, I think I was about 13 or 14, when the Haganah [an underground Jewish defence force in pre-state Palestine] came to recruit us to do things. We used to run at night and post [messages] and run away. It started early."

She said that she and her other sister, who was just three years older, joined the army together.

At the time, it wasn't mandatory for women to join the army. Only men were conscripted.

"Coming from this type of home, we volunteered," Waldston said.

She said they joined just two weeks after the Israel Defence Forces was established. Waldston pointed to the number on her dog tags that showed that within that short time, more that 60,000 others had already joined before them.

"In the first week, we went to turanut, training. I came from the Haganah, so I knew a little more... The second week, both of us went to the sergeant course with about 20 or 30 others," Waldston said.

"It was a month-long course. There you get really trained – how to throw a grenade, how to train other people."

She said that toward the end of the course, the woman in charge of female army recruits came to speak to them about Israel's situation, and about the problems in Jerusalem.

She said that at the time Jerusalem was surrounded by Arab forces who had cut off the water and food supply to the Jews, and no one could get in or out of the city.

But the IDF was secretly building the Burma Road to gain access to Jerusalem.

When the head of female recruits interviewed each soldier in the course individually, Waldston's sister volunteered to serve in Jerusalem.

"She had a rough time there. She was a sergeant, and she was in charge of the girls."

Meanwhile, Waldston was assigned to teach new army recruits.

"I remember, I must have been 18½ or something. I was young, but there were volunteers who were older than me. A woman, who must have been 45 or something, came to ask me for a three-day pass to get to the Golan because her son was injured. A 45-year-old coming to ask me for permission. Naturally, I gave it to her, but until today, I remember it so well, and I remember her face," she said, looking off into the distance, no doubt recalling that moment more than 60 years ago.

After about three or four months, Waldston was sent to a sergeant major's course, where she and another woman were the only two females in the course and became two of the first sergeant majors in the IDF.

She recalled being told by the head of the course that she and her female colleague would be exempt from the physically demanding training.

"But we said, 'No, we want to do everything the men do'... We convinced him that we could do it... Sure enough we did it," she said.

At the start of 1949, Waldston, by then an officer, was transferred to serve with the air force at its headquarters in Jaffa.

Waldston said that she didn't know it at the time, but her future brother-in-law, the late Eddy Kaplansky, a native of Montreal and a veteran of the Royal Canadian Air Force in World War II, was a Machal pilot in the Israeli Air Force during the War of Independence.

He ended up meeting and marrying Waldston's sister, who moved with him to Montreal.

Waldston, who finished her service in the army as a second lieutenant, went on to work as a flight attendant for El Al.

When she took a vacation to Montreal to visit her sister, she met Gerry Waldston, whom she married, and she has lived in Canada since 1952.

Waldston said she is very proud to be an IDF pioneer, but she never did anything for accolades.

"Everyone in the family did something for the country. We just didn't sit back. We did things because we wanted to do it. We volunteered because it was natural to do it."

Vol. 2 of Simchovitch's Yiddish-English collection published

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

The recently published second volume of The Fiery Mountain, Simcha (Sam) Simchovitch's career-spanning compilation of his poems, is like the first one, a uniquely bilingual Yiddish-English collection.

That might sound odd, considering that Simchovitch is equally adept in both languages, but the vagaries of the publishing industry have meant that his 18 books, prior to The Fiery Mountain, had to be written in one or the other language, since putting the two together, facing each other in different typefaces, was deemed too complicated by his publishers.

It's also why the 87-year-old Toronto poet is self-publishing The Fiery Mountain, which when complete in three volumes, will contain some 500 poems.

The title of the three-volume series, says Simchovitch, sitting in his north Toronto kitchen, "is a metaphor, first of Mount Sinai [where Moses is said to have received the Ten Commandments] and as a metaphor of the Holocaust."

'I have a prayer not to be silenced'

The horrors of the Holocaust weigh heavy on Simchovitch, who lost all of his family except for a sister and aunt during that time, but he is unusual among Canadian Yiddish poets in that he is just as likely to address current, less specifically Jewish concerns such as nuclear war, which he refers to memorably in his poem A Kaddish for the World.

"In an eyeblink haughty skyscrapers crumble, wrapped in flame – clouds, blasted in successive jolts, fiery debris carried over the horizon," he writes. "It's a danger all the time," he says somberly about the possibility of this occurring. "I'm socially aware," he adds, "following the news and so on."

Simchovitch, who was born in Otwock, Poland, spent World War II in the USSR, where he met and married his late wife and they had the first of their two daughters. After a brief return to Poland and a stint in Paris, the family immigrated to Montreal in 1949.

"For the first two years, I worked in a factory," he says. "Then I was accepted in the United Jewish Teachers Seminary [in Montreal]." After studying there for three years, Simchovitch became certified as a full-time teacher (of Yiddish and Hebrew) and taught in Montreal, Ottawa and, finally, in Toronto where he moved in 1961. Until his retirement in 1988, he was the librarian and curator of the Beth Tzedec Museum (now the Reuben & Helene Dennis Museum), where he still works on Sundays.

Simchovitch has written books, essays and articles in English, Yiddish and Hebrew; many of his English-language books have been published by the respected Mosaic Press and favourably commented upon by such well-known Canadian poets as Raymond Souster and James Deahl, as well as the author and activist Elie Wiesel.

Sam Simchovitch

Simchovitch also had a unique relationship with the poet Irving Layton. "Layton was my teacher of English [at] the beginning of his career," he says, adding that Layton offered the ultimate compliment to his poem Sanctifying God's Name by saying it "should be recited in the synagogues."

Simchovitch, who has won several Toronto Jewish Book Awards over the years, also translated more than 80 Yiddish poems of Mordechai Gebirtig in The Song That Never Died: The Poetry of Mordechai Gebirtig (2001) and has written one autobiographical novel, Stepchild of the Vistula, a 1990 Yiddish novel, which was translated by Simchovitch into English in 1994 and then translated into Polish in 2005 by Marian Domanski, and issued in a handsome edition, with an introduction by Wiesel.

Simchovitch's hometown of Otwock invited him and Domanski to visit there last summer for the commemoration of the 65th anniversary of the liquidation of the city's ghetto, an experience he wrote about in The CJN.

Two years ago, vocalist Lenka Lichtenberg and guitarist/pianist Brian Katz combined forces to put 10 of his poems to music on the CD Pashtes (Simplicity).

Simchovitch's poems – and the modest man himself – can also be said to evoke simplicity, his plain-spoken words underlying strong, emotional themes, as in the poem Yiddish Tongue.

"Wherever, I go," he writes, "I carry the orphaned voices of those who are no more – my Yiddish language and lore." O Yiddish language," he goes on, "mother tongue, you are sweet like honey and, like wormwood, bitter. With you I have risen and fallen, with you I mourn and sing, in your pained letters I sink, until my heartbeat will stand suddenly still."

That poem also forces one to contemplate the state and future of Yiddish as a living everyday language. Simchovitch, who names 22 Yiddish poets in his poem Yiddish Poets of Canada, says he's "the last Yiddish poet in Canada," the others having passed away or like Chava Rosenfarb, moved onto writing Yiddish novels.

"I have a prayer not to be silenced," is how he explains his continuing to write in Yiddish, though he adds that "it's harder lately to write poetry." The Fiery Mountain, then, can be seen as his legacy for the ages. "It looks like I wrote already everything that I wanted to say."

The Fiery Mountain can be purchased for $25 in Negev and Israel's Judaica stores or by sending a cheque for $32, including shipping and handling, to the Simcha Simchovitch Book Fund, 4266 Bathurst St., Apt. 803, Toronto, Ont., M3H 5Y7.

TJFF award in memory of young filmmaker

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

This year, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival is offering a new award in memory of a local filmmaker who contributed to the festival.

The David A. Stein Memorial Award is given, along with a prize of $5,000, for the best documentary making its Canadian première at the TJFF.

Stein died of a brain tumour weeks after diagnosis, at age 34 in December 2004. He had made trailers – one-minute ads – for the festival.

The Stein family of Toronto and the contributions of extended family and friends have made possible the award, named the "Tzimmie," after Stein's production company, Tzimmes Entertainment.

About eight years ago, Stein approached Helen Zuckerman, executive director of the TJFF, regarding funding for his films. She remembers the encounter, and says that "it was his passion about making films that had me."

Stein's 1998 film Needle and Tread, in which his bubbie recounts her days as an immigrant seamstress in Toronto sweatshops, went on to play at the festival to an audience of 600 people, who showed their high regard for the film with loud applause, Zuckerman recalls.

Last fall, David's father, Mel, was thinking about doing something in David's memory.

"I spoke with Helen Zuckerman to get her point of view," he says. "I wanted the reward to have some meaning, something that would be meaningful for a filmmaker. The money gets filmmakers reasonably along their careers."

Stealing Klimt* won the first TJFF Tzimmie Award.

Often a film may not come to fruition because of funding issues. "Sometimes the difference between doing it and not doing it is a few thousand dollars," Stein says.

Memorial donations made when David passed away have been transferred to the David Stein Memorial Fund.

"I am getting a feeling of some satisfaction. The loss of a child by a parent is a very profound experience. Being able to do something meaningful in that context is meaningful to a parent," Stein says.

"Years from now it will continue as an award. It's something that will have some life of its own that will keep going."

The family decided that the choice of winning film should be up to the festival and its judges. "I don't believe that any of the family or friends should be judges. It should be objective, more in the nature of David's peers than us," Stein says.

The Israeli feature Stealing Klimt, directed by Canadian Jane Chablani, was the winning film, announced on opening night of the TJFF at Bloor Cinema on May 3.

The film is about Maria Altman, whose family owned paintings by Gustav Klimt, stolen by the Austrians during the war. The prize money won by the filmmaker will be donated to the Association of Jewish Refugees in London, England, which works toward the recovery of stolen art.

Three jurors reached a unanimous decision for the award: broadcaster and journalist Ralph Benmergui; Judy Gladstone of Bravo; and Tereza Barta, a professor of film at York University. Fifteen films were eligible for the award, and the jury will change every year.

"It was the story that won it, a fascinating mystery story. It was a story of stick to it-ness. Someone who was not going to back down, someone who fought her way through bureaucracies of both countries," Zuckerman says.

Two other films received honorable mention: Orthodox Stance, about a 19-year-old Russo-American observant boxer, and To Live in Utopia, about factory workers in the Bronx.

Israeli spy sent to sabotage Egypt's missile program

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival is presenting films for virtually every taste.

The Champagne Spy

Nadav Shirman's sizzling documentary burnishes but also tarnishes the reputation of the legendary Israeli spy, Ze'ev Gur Arie. Otherwise known as Wolfgang Lotz, he was sent to Egypt in the early 1960s to pose as an affluent horse breeder.

Lotz's mission was two-fold: to gather firsthand data about Egypt's arms acquisitions and to sabotage its budding missile program, spearheaded by German scientists who had worked for Adolf Hitler. A half-Jew who fled Germany with his Jewish mother after Hitler's rise to power, he was uniquely positioned to play that role. He had Aryan features, was not circumcised, spoke perfect German, had nerves of steel and was fearless, and could effortlessly connect with people and extract vital information from them.

The 90-minute film, which moves from the present to the past and back again, begins as Lotz explains to an Israeli TV interviewer how he adopted the false identity of a dashing, high-living former Nazi and Wehrmacht officer based in Egypt. "He lived his character," says one of his Mossad associates. "He could have been a good stage actor," observes another colleague. "The job was made for him."

Throughout it all, Lotz led a double life, moving seamlessly between two very different worlds. In Cairo, he befriended Egyptian army officers and German expatriates. Recharging his batteries every few months, he would return to Paris, where his wife, Rivka, and son, Oded, lived temporarily.

The Champagne Spy unfolds through the perspective of his son – who loved and admired his father and implicitly knew was he was up to – and through old family movies and interviews with colleagues.

Even after he was caught, shortly before Israeli spy Eli Cohen was executed in Syria in 1965, he succeeded in concealing the fact that he was an Israeli national. Yet Lotz was also a bigamist, having married Waltraud Neumann, a German woman he had met in Cairo. The Mossad had moral qualms about this arrangement, but ultimately tolerated it because Waltraud was a valued asset.

As the film suggests, life for Lotz following his escapades in Egypt was rather dull and disappointing. After his horse farm in Israel failed and Neumann died, he was at loose ends, piling up debts and living aimlessly. When the champagne stop flowing, he became a pale imitation of his former self, and finally, a lonely and tragic figure.

Sunday, May 11, 11 a.m., Al Green Theatre.

Arranged

This feature film, directed by Diane Erespo and Stefan Schaefer and starring an unknown but accomplished cast, examines the phenomenon of arranged marriages among traditional Jews and Muslims.

Nasira (Francis Benhamou) and Rochelle (Zoe Lister-Jones) form an unlikely friendship in Arranged, playing at the Bloor Cinema on May 9 at 1 p.m.

Rochelle (Zoe Lister-Jones) and Nasira (Francis Benhamou) are both new teachers at a Brooklyn public school. They are as different as night and day, Rochelle being an Orthodox Jew and Nasira being a Syrian Muslim. To their thoroughly modern and somewhat blinkered principal, however, they are identical peas in a pod.

When they come under pressure from their parents to choose a spouse from a list of preferred candidates, they co-operate with the plan. Once they have met the less than captivating men that have been selected for their consideration, they rebel. They are not willing to settle for just anyone. In the process, they form an unlikely cross-cultural friendship.

Sparks fly when Rochelle invites Nasira to her home. Being anti-Arab, Rochelle's closeted mother claims that there may be "repercussions" that will hurt her prospects. By contrast, Nasira's parents are more welcoming when she brings Rochelle to their house.

In her quest to find Mr. Right, Rochelle attends a party to which her secular cousin takes her. She feels uncomfortable in that milieu and rejects it. Nasira, meanwhile, glows with satisfaction after being introduced to a suitable young Muslim man. In an interesting twist, Rochelle spies the man of her dreams in a library, prepping for an exam with Nasira's brother.

Friday, May 9, 1 p.m., Bloor Cinema.

The First Basket

Basketball, an international sport, originated in the United States and was popularized by Jews in New York City before going global. Jews took to the game like ducks to water, suggests sports writer Charley Rose in David Vyorst's engaging documentary. "And they really put their stamp on it."

Sports in general and basketball in particular appealed to Jews because it was "a powerful vehicle" for social integration and acceptance. So much so that the basketball coach replaced the rabbi as a central force in the lives of these young athletic Jewish men. Indeed, compared to boxing, which was harder to "sell" to dubious parents, basketball was deemed to be a "good" sport.

The Jewish legends of basketball are trotted out. Arnold (Red) Auerbach, one of basketball's greatest tactical minds, coached the Boston Celtics to eight National Basketball Association titles. Nat Holman, an intellectual who read Molliere and Shakespeare, was Auerbach's predecessor at the Celtics. In 1949, Holman helped establish basketball in Israel.

David Stern, the current NBA commissioner, recalls walking to games at Madison Square Garden to watch his heroes play. But these days, Jewish professional basketball players are rare, Dan Schayes having been one of the last of them. Basketball, though, is big in Israel. Tal Brody, an American who made aliyah and played for the Maccabi Tel Aviv club, was one of its biggest stars before his retirement.

Sunday, May 11, 2 p.m., Al Green

Danny Kaye: A Legacy of Laughter

Danny Kaye, the multi-talented comedian who could act, sing and dance, is the subject of Bob Marty's puff piece profile, which originally appeared on the PBS television network.

Born David Kaminsky in 1913, the son of Russian immigrants, he went into show business after setting his sights on a career in medicine. "I'm crazy about what I do," he once said. Working in one-reel films and as a tummler at Borsch Belt resorts in the Catskills, he broke into film after signing a five-year contract with Samuel Goldwyn in 1943. His movies, ranging from The Kid From Brooklyn to White Christmas, catapulted Kaye to stardom and the cover of Time magazine, and prompted UNICEF – a United Nations agency – to offer him a roving ambassadorship.

Friday, May 9, 2:30 p.m., Al Green.

To Be Or Not To Be

Ernst Lubitsch's 1943 comedy classic, starring Jack Benny and Carole Lombard as conceited actors in a Warsaw theatre in 1939, has not aged badly, though it looks a little dated and quaint. In terms of plot, the wily pair become embroiled in a surreal plot to ridicule and bamboozle the Nazis. The pace is fast and furious, though a bit convoluted, the farce is cutting, and the film resounds to the sardonic chorus of "Heil Hitlers." Lubitsch made the film before realizing that the Nazis were intent on exterminating European Jews.

Friday, May 9, 5 p.m., Al Green.

Fugitive Pieces' new 'upbeat' ending is disquieting

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Fugitive Pieces* has been turned into a much simpler film than originally intended, reporter contends.

The decision to change the ending of Jeremy Podeswa's film adaptation of Anne Michael's acclaimed novel Fugitive Pieces from the one unveiled last fall, when the movie opened the Toronto International Film Festival, is both appalling and sad. Considering that the change renders this Holocaust-themed film "upbeat" is also disquieting and more than a little offensive.

The film's conclusion, as initially conveyed and faithful to the novel's ending, was a tragic one, with Holocaust survivor Jakob (Stephen Dillane), and his new love Michaela (Ayelet Zurer), both killed in a traffic accident in Greece. Ben (Ed Stoppard), Jakob's friend and neighbour from Montreal, has travelled abroad to collect their possessions after the pair have died.

Ben reads from Jakob's writings, with tears streaming down his cheeks, and absorbs the painful irony that a man who had finally been able to write optimistically about his future has now had that future suddenly ended in a flash. Equally upsetting was the realization that Michaela was pregnant, information she had left in a note for Jakob, but one that he never got to read. [Next three paragraphs contain spoilers].

That was the cut I saw last fall at a press screening. The new version of the film is significantly different. That's because Jakob and Michaela don't die at all, and the telling words written and narrated by Jakob are entirely hopeful ones. Jakob lives, he will find out that Michaela is expecting his child, who will be named after his sister Bella, who vanished during the Holocaust, and all will be right with the world. Jakob, who lost his family at the film's outset, has now, after much travail, found a new one of his own.

Undoubtedly, for many people, this conclusion will be an easier one to absorb than the other ending would have been. It's not as emotionally jarring, nor does it provoke questions about God, life and the meaning of the universe, the concerns of Holocaust survivors such as Primo Levi and Elie Wiesel, to name two of the most famous examples among those who have tried to glean something out of the unimaginable horrors of the past. Fugitive Pieces has been turned into a much simpler, more obvious film, with a pat ending that reassures instead of disturbs.

Film's revision is entirely unacceptable

This revision is problematic, to say the least, and on artistic grounds entirely unacceptable. It also sets a possible new precedent in Canada, wherein movies' sad endings may regularly be altered after completion, in the hopes that the box office can be improved if only the films end on an optimistic note. [Spoilers end]

This isn't new in cinema; from the 1950s version of Invasion of the Body Snatchers to '80s hit Fatal Attraction, among so many others, Hollywood has frequently done this to movies deemed too downbeat, usually after the films have been test screened for unsophisticated audiences who have objected to the unhappy endings. I don't know if that was the specific case here; regardless of the reasons, the damage has been done.

In a joint statement issued to this reporter, director Podeswa and producer Robert Lantos said, "We wanted the audience to leave the film with a sense of hope, not despair. We feel that the spirit and essence of the novel are still very much embedded in this film. What the book conveys about history and memory, about living with the past without letting it destroy you, about the healing power of love and compassion – these are equally the concerns of the movie."

I wonder if Michaels, who was unavailable to comment for this article but who introduced the first cut of the film at Toronto's Jewish Book Fair last November, would agree. Nor can I easily believe, despite his statement, that Podeswa, who spoke to me in a phone interview for an article last August about the love and reverence he felt for the novel, would readily go along with, or conceive of this revision, thereby betraying Michaels' novel in the process.

The craziest aspect of all this is that whoever decided to make the change to Fugitive Pieces, has, in effect, bungled the job, so much so that the box office possibilities of the film will probably be less than they otherwise would have been.

For starters, when American producers tamper with their movies, they usually make sure the changes have been put in play before the film is press screened. Here, virtually every Canadian film critic of note has seen the initial cut of the film, because it opened Toronto's prestigious film festival, and, likely, so have many American and European reviewers.

This suggests, of course, that the decision to change the film was made later on, but it's also allowed comparisons to be made between the two cuts of the movie, which would otherwise not have been the case. And it's a safe bet, that most of the critics, whether they liked the film or not, won't comment favourably on the happier ending.

Then, you have the fans of Michaels' novel, and they are legion, who won't want to go out to a movie that so alters their favourite book. Other serious filmgoers, who read the reviews, will likely not want to see it, either, so the makers of Fugitive Pieces will be left right back where they started, trying to sell the public on a Canadian Holocaust-themed movie without any big name stars. And, I doubt they're going to market this movie by emphasizing that it's a feel good Holocaust film. In that light, why didn't they trust the audience to find the film simply because it was a good, honest movie, in fact, one of the better recent English Canadian films of note.

As a discerning film critic, who found this movie, a few weak performances aside, to be a generally moving, poignant and powerful experience, I'm saddened by this turn of affairs. Despite the strengths that still exist in the film, notably the beautifully rendered relationship between the young Jakob (Robbie Kay) and Athos (Rade Sherbedgia), the kindly non-Jewish Greek archeologist who rescues him from the Holocaust and later brings him to Canada, I can't in good conscience recommend you see Fugitive Pieces. The bowdlerizing of this movie goes against everything I believe art should be and smacks of the dumbing down and pandering to audiences that has become almost the norm in much of today's cinema. Perhaps, the honest ending of the film will be restored when Fugitive Pieces will be released on DVD, but even if it is, it won't eliminate the bad taste left by what was done to the movie beforehand. We don't make nearly enough good movies in this country, especially outside of Quebec, that we can afford to trash the few quality ones we do make. But that's what's been done to Fugitive Pieces, to the detriment of us all.

Israeli appears in Canadian film about the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ayelet Zurer's acting career has not been the same since her cameo role in Steven Spielberg's film, Munich, which was released in 2005.

"It was a complete turning point," said Zurer, one of Israel's leading actresses. "It was like a huge wave."

Ayelet Zurer

Since then, Zurer – the recipient of an Israeli Film Academy Award for best actress – has appeared in three Hollywood movies and a Canadian film, Fugitive Pieces, which had its world première at the 32nd Toronto International Film Festival last September and opens here on May 2.

"It was wonderful being directed by Spielberg," said Zurer in an interview during the festival. "I felt very lucky to be on set. He's a very brilliant man and nice, too."

Munich, which unfolds against the backdrop of the Arab-Israeli conflict, was her first English-language film. She was asked to audition for it shortly after giving birth to her first child, Eliad.

Preoccupied by motherhood, Zurer, 38, was doubtful whether she would even bother reading for the role as the wife of an Israeli commando who joins a hit team tasked to hunt down Palestinian terrorists who killed Israeli Olympic athletes in Germany.

But after learning that Spielberg would be the director, she had a change of heart. Three weeks later, she was informed that the role was hers.

After Munich, she and her husband – a swimming instructor – and their infant son moved to Los Angeles.

"Career-wise, it's smart to be in L.A.," said Zurer, who was in Toronto last autumn to promote Fugitive Pieces. "I'm very open to anything, though I miss home very much."

Born and raised in Tel Aviv, she is certain that her appearance in Munich, not to mention her Israeli film credits, brought her to the attention of Jeremy Podeswa, the director of Fugitive Pieces, which is based on the Anne Michaels' novel of the same name.

In Israel, Zurer has starred in a succession of feature films, notably in Nina's Tragedies, a bittersweet comedy that won 11 Israeli Film Academy Awards.

She was also in Florentine, a popular TV series.

For Fugitive Pieces, which turns, in part, on memory and the Holocaust, she was asked to read for the part of Michaela, a sensitive soul who falls in love with a Holocaust survivor. The audition took place very close to the start of production.

Zurer, a plain-spoken woman without the slightest airs, is satisfied with Fugitive Pieces. "I'm very pleased. It's a complex film with many different layers. It was an achievement to translate the novel into a film."

In Hollywood, Zurer has made three films, one of which, Vantage Point, was released this past winter.

Taking place in Spain, it turns on the assassination of an American president. Improbably enough, she plays a terrorist, opposite Dennis Quaid.

She will also appear, with Jeff Goldblum and Willem Dafoe, in Adam's Resurrection and in Snappers, an independent film.

"I'm usually drawn to dramatic roles," she said. "I like a strong script. This is the most important thing."

Zurer, a performer in an army entertainment troupe during her military service in Israel, launched her career in 1994 in an Israeli television series aimed at a youthful audience.

Her parents, Joshua and Aviva, were initially opposed to her decision to pursue acting. "But now they're my best fans and very proud."

She has no idea whether she is in Los Angeles to stay. This obviously depends on how her career develops. "But I wouldn't like to think I'll never go back to live in Israel," she said. "My roots are very important."

Documentary reunites metal band for world tour

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Anvil were once hailed as the demigods of Canadian heavy metal.

The band influenced a musical generation, including the metal bands Metallica, Slayer and Anthrax. Although Anvil never made it big, the band was persistent, recording 12 albums.

In the summer of 2005, wondering what happened to Anvil, writer and director Sacha Gervasi, the band's former roadie, typed their name into Google.

"This semi-official website came up, so I wrote the webmaster, 'I'm an old friend of the band, my name is Tea Bag, and I'm really anxious to get in touch with them,'" said British-born Gervasi during brunch at Toronto's Sutton Place Hotel.

Steve (Lips) Kudlow, Anvil's guitarist, wrote back: "We thought you died or became a lawyer."

Gervasi is now a successful Hollywood screenwriter. He wrote the screenplay for Steven Spielberg's The Terminal, which starred Tom Hanks.

When Gervais got in touch with Kudlow, Kudlow was delivering for a catering company, while the band's drummer, Robb Reiner, worked in demolition.

"So I got him [Kudlow] a ticket and picked him up at the airport. It was as if no time had passed – it was just magical," Gervais said.

While in Los Angeles, they met with Gervasi's friend and mentor Steve Zaillian, who won an Academy Award for his screenplay for Schindler's List.

Zaillian and Gervasi talked about Anvil. "I told Steve [Zaillian], 'I think there's something – I don't know what it is, they never quit. They never made it, but kept churning out these albums,'" Gervasi said.

It was Zaillian who suggested that Gervasi do a documentary about the band.

For the film, Anvil! The Story of Anvil, Gervasi followed the now-fiftysomething rockers, inseparable since their teens, on a world tour. Shot in London; Toronto; Parry Sound, Ont.; and Tokyo and Kyoto, Japan, as well as in Austria and Romania, the film also includes footage of moments from their past.

The band performed to enthusiastic audiences at sold-out film festival screenings during Sundance in Park City, Utah, and recently at Toronto's Hot Docs, where the documentary ranked sixth out of the top 10 audience favourites.

"You'd think that someone who spent 30 years crushed on the sidewalk of life by the shoes of fate would be bitter, but Lips was quite the opposite," Gervasi said. "He thought, 'I guess that's life and I'm not going to quit.' That's pretty admirable."

Gervasi first came across Anvil on the cover of the rock magazine Sounds in April 1982. Gervasi was 15 when he met the band at a concert in London, England, the following September.

"We bonded. I knew everything there was to know about the music, so they invited me on tour the following summer. My parents were divorced, so I ostensibly spent the summer with my father and hopped on the train to join the tour," Gervasi said.

"My mother went completely nuts, but I didn't really care. I toured twice more 'cause my mom's family, the Kosoys, are from Toronto, so I'd visit my family and rehearse and do shows with the group."

Enjoying a resurgence of popularity, Kudlow, Reiner and bassist Glenn Five, who joined the band 12 years ago, now play in packed clubs. Recently, Anvil performed at the Bovine Club on Toronto's Queen Street West.

"The Jews of Metal" as Gervasi fondly calls the band, are back on the road, taking the documentary to New York's BAM Brooklyn Academy of Music on May 31; Sydney's film festival, at which Anvil will play for 2,000 people; the Melbourne International Film Festival and the San Francisco Jewish Film Festival.

TULCHINSKY'S FIVE BOOKS OF MOSES WINS VANCOUVER'S 'ONE BOOK' COMPETITION

The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky, the novel by ex-Torontonian Karen X. Tulchinsky that is set almost entirely in the Jewish community of Toronto of the 1930s, 1940s and 1950s, has won a prestigious literary award in Vancouver, thousands of miles from where the story takes place.

The book, which documents the life and times of fictional boxer Sonny Lapinsky and his family, has been chosen winner of One Book, One Vancouver, a program that the Vancouver Public Library sponsors to get Vancouverites to read and talk about the same book together.

When The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky came out in 2003, one reviewer commented that Tulchinsky "does for Toronto what Mordecai Richler did for Montreal." Library spokesperson Janice Douglas called the novel "superbly crafted," and the One Book, One Vancouver committee said it was "crammed with humour, sorrow, folly, bravery and the richness of everyday life."

Now living in Vancouver, Tulchinsky has been working on a screen adaptation of the novel titled Sticks and Stones. She has been invited to give a series of readings at various library branches in Vancouver over the next few months. One would hope that in coming months Toronto readers, just like those of Vancouver, will discover this novel, which stands as one of the best works of fiction yet about our own Jewish community.

The Sisters Rosensweig: The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company presents the Toronto première of The Sisters Rosensweig, Wendy Wasserstein's captivating look at three uncommon women and their quest for love, self-definition and fulfilment.

Wasserstein, who died two years ago at 55, "spoke for a generation of smart, driven but sometimes unsatisfied women in a series of popular plays" that included the Pulitzer Prize winner, The Heidi Chronicles, and The Sisters Rosensweig, according to the obituary that appeared in the New York Times.

"Ms. Wasserstein drew on her own experience as a smart, well-educated, funny Manhattanite who wasn't particularly lucky in romance to create heroines in a similar mould, women who embraced the essential tenets of the feminist movement but didn't have the stomach for stridency."

The Sisters Rosensweig premièred on Broadway in 1993. It tells the story of one weekend in the lives of three Jewish-American sisters from Brooklyn who gather in London to celebrate the birthday of the oldest sister. The Toronto production is directed by Jim Warren and stars Rosemary Dunsmore, Linda Kash and Sarah Dodd. It previews from June 7, opens June 12, and runs until June 21 at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Performing Arts' Jane Mallett Theatre, 27 Front St. E. Tickets are $41.50 to $69.50. 416-366-7723, www.stlc.com

Guitar Duet: Brian Katz and Rob Piltch don't perform together often, so their upcoming performance is a rare opportunity to hear these elegant guitar maestros in conversation. They offer an evening of standards, improvisations and Katz originals, with Katz on a nylon-string (classical) guitar and Piltch on electric. Free Times Café, 320 College St. May 16; sets at 8 and 10 p.m. $25 dinner buffet; $10 cover. Reservations, 416-967-1078.

Book Launch at Israel's: Gerald Tulchinsky, historian and author of Canada's Jews: A People's Journey (University of Toronto Press) will discuss and read from his book at Israel's Judaica, 870 Eglinton Ave. W. on Thursday, May 15, 7:30 p.m. Refreshments; everyone welcome. Please RSVP by e-mail, awilson@utpress.utoronto.ca. (In case you were wondering, Gerald and the above-mentioned Karen X. Tulchinsky are first cousins once removed; a writing gene must run in the family.)

Jewish Genealogy on Display: Tracing Our Jewish Roots is an exhibition of resources from the library collection of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (Toronto). Pieces in the exhibition highlight the shtetls where our ancestors once walked, the immigrant experience, and life within the early Jewish community of Toronto; other material focuses on Holocaust research, Canada's Jewish war veterans and notable ancestral trees. At the North York Central Library, Canadiana Room, 5120 Yonge St., 6th floor, until June 30.

Livingstone loses London mayorship

JTA

LONDON — Ken Livingstone, a frequent critic of Israel, was beaten in London's mayoral election.

The Conservative Party's Boris Johnson was confirmed with 53 per cent of the vote Saturday to 47 per cent for Livingstone, the Labour incumbent. Johnson was sworn in the same day.

Livingstone has accused Israel of "ethnic cleansing" and refused to apologize after comparing a Jewish journalist from London to a Nazi concentration camp guard.

Boris Johnson

Ken Livingstone

The first person to serve as the mayor of London, a post created in 2000, Livingstone served two terms.

Johnson, a former journalist and MP, visited Israel in 2004, and his website displays pictures of him with a group of female soldiers and shaking hands with Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

During a pre-election tour in predominantly Jewish districts in northern London last month, Johnson told JTA he would never invite anti-Semitic figures to London, if elected. Johnson was referring to his predecessor's controversial decision to invite Islamist scholar and spiritual leader Yusuf Al-Qaradawi, who supports killing of Israeli civilians, to a conference in 2004.

Johnson has worked to understand the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and has been a supporter of Israel. He opposed a call last year by Britain's University College Union to boycott Israeli colleges and universities.

While many London Jews supported Johnson, others, such as prominent Guardian columnist Jonathan Freedland, endorsed Livingstone, arguing he was better qualified to run the city than the inexperienced Johnson. Jewish organizations traditionally refrain from endorsing political candidates.

Squash-playing brothers win at Ontario Open

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The youngest of four sports-loving brothers, Ethan Shoihet has had to put up with the indignities of being pounded upon by his older siblings.

Yeah, he shrugs, his older brother Albert did "beat me up," but "he's a great older brother. He's tons of fun."

Like younger brothers everywhere, Ethan, 10, took up the same sports his older brothers enjoy – particularly squash and rugby – and because his older brothers constantly pushed him, he's had to work harder to keep up.

The result can readily be seen on the squash court, where Ethan recently won the last two Ontario tournaments he entered, and he did pretty well at the nationals, playing against kids a couple of years older than him.

Adding to the family's pride is that Ethan, winner of the under-11 category at the Ontario Junior Open Championship, was joined in the winner's circle by Albert, 15, who took top honours in the Under-17 group.

Two brothers, two champions.

Ethan took the title with three straight 3-0 shutouts in the best-of-five final, semi-final and quarter-final matches.

Albert won his championship with a little more drama. In the final, he was tied at one win a piece with nemesis Adam Engel and then lost the third game by a resounding 9-0 margin.

In game four, he fell behind 7-3, but rallied to win and then went on to take the deciding fifth game.

In the final, he showed more than that: "He has good mental toughness," Earl said. "I thought he was done, but he came back."

With the Open win, Albert's provincial ranking (under-17) moves to fifth; Ethan's (under-11) is first.

Ethan, who is 4 foot 10 and 90 pounds, is quite modest about his success. "I'm a bit bigger than the kids I play. I do a lot of training, so I run them out, make them as tired as possible."

But then comes the telltale hint that, on the squash court at least, he is master of his domain. "Sometimes I feel like putting it away quickly."

Ethan was pushed a little in the semi-final at the Ontario Open, which saw players from across Canada compete, but the fact he didn't lose a game at the provincials suggests he's something special at his sport.

His coach at the Oakville Club, Mike Way, agrees. Ethan, he said, is the complete package. "He's got talent and a work ethic."

"He's a little workhorse. He plays very strong and very fast. He's a very good athlete and very competitive. He's a physical little beast."

Way, who's coached world champion Jonathon Power, a Canadian, believes Ethan "will have an exceptional career if he continues."

"I haven't seen a kid this good, this young," said Way.

Jacob, 17, was the first to pick up a racket and excel, but all the Shoihet brothers are pretty good athletes. Caleb, 13, plays rep basketball and rugby and Albert, before a knee injury sidelined him, also played AAA hockey.

As for Albert, Way believes Ethan's big brother has even more talent, but not Ethan's competitive drive.

Still, Albert is Ontario Open champion and ranked fifth in the province. His Open championship came after 18 months away from the sport while he recovered from knee problems brought on by a growth spurt. Missing that much time and still winning the title is a testament to his abilities, Way said.

"He's got hands and the mind and the tactical aspect" to be a great player.

"Albert is a natural talent," he added.

Nevertheless, there's room for improvement in both brother's games, Way continued. "The big brother has to get the work ethic from little brother, and little brother need to get the touch and tactics of big brother."

Both boys have the potential to make the under-19 junior national team and compete for Canada at the international level. It's even possible that Ethan, when he reaches age 15, will make the junior "squad," a wider pool of players from which the team is selected, he's that good.

Ethan has shown he can compete above his age level. At the nationals in Victoria a few weeks ago, he played with kids two to 2½ years older – a huge spread at his age – and still managed to finish fifth in the Under-13 event, even beating the tournament's third seed, Way said.

SALUTE ON WHEELS: As part of celebrations of Israel's 60th anniversary, the Israel Defence Forces organized "Salute on Wheels," the largest cross-country bike ride in Israel's history. Hundreds of participants from all walks of life cycled across Israel during the intermediate days of Passover. The ride started at the tomb of David Ben-Gurion in Sde Boker in the Negev, travelled north via Sderot and Ashkelon and ended in Kiryat Shmona near the Lebanese border. [Israel photo]

The show must go on

ALMOST FAMOUS
BY JACOB MEDJUCK

Larry Bird. Michael Jordan. Star Wars. The Matrix. Success happens.

To understand the why, when and how of it typically requires hindsight.

That's what I thought, anyway, until last week, when I saw beyond the experience I was having while sitting in row "O" watching the regional theatre production of a classic Broadway musical that I adored growing up.

Not to sound too fawning, but the sets were fantastic. Very professional. The trademark of regional theatre is usually the opposite when it comes to sets. But in this case, the sets were great.

The performers were – how to put it? – "regional," but sturdy. The audience, while enormous, had realistic expectations. Which was great. But what sparked my attention in this production had more to do with the script than the staging, more to do with story structure than on-stage construction.

The music was as breezy and infectious as ever, and the plot was sincere and relevant. And if Tony Award trophies were Jewish men, the original Broadway version of this play could've held a minyan with the number of statues it won, while as a movie, it grabbed 10 Oscars.

And yet, when costumes in a film become dated, we say it's a "period" piece or nostalgic. But when jokes become dated, it's just not funny.

Wow. Not funny. Acclaimed, even lauded, but not funny. Dramatic and poignant, but not funny. With punch lines like "flabber-jabber?" Hmmm.

This Romeo and Juliet adaptation pitted locals against immigrants – a classic social clash, whether it's black versus white, or Jews versus everyone else. But I found this particular mounting comically current and poignantly punctuated by the accidental casting quirk that had "scripted as" Puerto Ricans all played by local Asians. It was a classic "commentary" play that actually mirrored the mixed community that was putting it on.

It was ironically relevant, passionate and catchy, worldly and respected, but still, not very funny.

Why the concern? We are talking about a legacy show after all, right?

Well, to explain: I've recently had implanted in me a promptly practical and predictive perspective, courtesy of repeated unprotected exposures to Neilsen ratings and studio marketing and distribution strategies over the past year.

All of which means, simply, that when the vertical hold is off on my television, it's distracting. When the sound is fuzzy on the radio, it's hard to stay engaged. Entertainment is a cold, quick business, and keeping your audience engaged is a serious priority. It's hard to suspend disbelief if I can see the strings holding up the UFO! So when any element of a production is consistently distracting me, that's a concern, and it directly affects the degree to which we're able to absorb additional themes and messages.

Performances that distract will fall out of favour. "You get more bees when you use honey" was (ironically) the message beaten into me early on.

Essentially, if it stings to watch a production's comedic elements, we're probably not consuming as much of the meaningful part of the play as its author intended.

This age-old, yet jazzed up, show is clearly a powerful story about tolerance and compassion, love and friendship. It's as relevant now as it was hundreds of years ago when it was first presented by William Shakespeare, then re-imagined by Broadway in 1957 and Hollywood in 1961.

Hundreds of years suggest that social advances would demand that earlier re-tooling of the tale.

But as I sat in row "O" last week, I wondering if it was already time for an update?

Rent. Avenue Q. UrineTown. It's getting spicy out there. I'm taking my jazz hands these days with the middle finger extended.

So when the show I'm watching feels undeniably like a museum of merriment and not like soaring entertainment, I do get sad that the great history of it all is slipping into shadow, yet I'm charged for a new stage of content that's about to rush in.

My feeling is that several classics will soon be recalled. Expect new ones by Christmas, such as Romeo and Romeo, Hello Dolly: The Cloning of Sheep, Fiddler on the Internet.

Not to be overly dramatic or anything.

Don't let injuries linger

FITNESS CORNER
BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Injuries: we've all had them, but most people only deal with their injuries if they're acute or very painful.

When we have an accident, we seek treatment for any resulting injuries right away, and most times, we get better.

But when the effects of an injury are only felt gradually over time, we tend to wait to get treatment. But injuries involving muscles, tendons and ligaments need attention as much as, if not more than, broken bones. Nobody would leave a broken leg unattended, but it always surprises me how many people will leave a strained ligament, tendon or muscle untreated.

I often hear, "If I just leave it alone, it will get better over time." Sometimes, that's true: an injury will seem to get better over time, but once you start to really use the injured part of your body again – especially in resistance training – the chance of re-injury becomes very high.

I always urge my clients to seek attention and regular maintenance for any injured area. Complete treatment of the injury is necessary so you can begin to regain your strength. To do that, you need proper diagnostic care from a doctor in order to direct you to the right rehabilitative treatment or treatments. Once you have completed the rehabilitative processes, only then can you start to rebuild.

But I have seen too many people not finish rehab, either because they think they can do it on their own or because rehab is too painful for them to complete. As a result, the injury never truly goes away, and as we age, that can cause pain and sometimes immobility.

Our body is an amazing piece of equipment, but if we damage it, we must fix it and fix it right. Most injuries involving muscles, tendons or joints are complicated, and if not treated, they can lead to other problems. Remember: once you have finished the rehab process, when rebuilding, you must to start from the beginning and build back up to where you came from.

Israel then, now and forever

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

On Yom Hazikaron (Memorial Day in Israel), the fourth day of the month of Iyar, we remember all those who have fallen on behalf of the Jewish state.

As we approach this heartrending day, ask yourself the following questions. What are your feelings about the 23,000 Israeli forces killed in wars and the citizens who died as a result of terrorism?

Do you appreciate the bravery of those in the Israel Defence Forces, the Jewish Brigade and the Yishuv – those who gave of themselves for your security and that of the Jewish People?

Do you appreciate, at a gut level, the soldiers in the Haganah and Irgun (pre-state forces), many of whom were Holocaust survivors and had just stepped off boats from Europe, who fought hand to hand with the enemy? Or the students on the bus whose last smile or cellphone call occurred just before an explosion that would snuff out their lives?

When a two-minute siren is heard at 11 a.m. in Israel marking the opening of the official memorial ceremonies, do you whisper a message of thanks to the Israeli mothers and fathers who waved goodbye, sometimes forever, to their cherished sons and daughters as they returned to their base to fight for us? Is this day special? Is it marked in your calendar?

Fortunately, there are many Toronto Jewish community members who do indeed recognize the sacrifice our Israeli brothers and sisters have made; however, there are others who now question the importance of the State of Israel and care little about such days as Yom Hazikaron. Many of these individuals can be found on our campuses buying into the yammering of professors who claim Israel is the most oppressive state in the world. These are our Jewish children. Oh how mistaken they are! How they will awaken when Israel must defend itself against evil nations like Iran that want to extirpate us!

On Yom Hazikaron, challenge them. Be patient but confront them. Ask those who question Israel's right to defend itself what they would do if crazy people living next store wanted to burn their house down. Answer patiently. Tell them that to be a Jew is difficult and the consequences of missing the importance of Israel are dangerous.

Then ask yourself – when Yom Ha'atzmaut enters on the fifth day of Iyar, the anniversary of the proclamation of the State of Israel in 1948, how much do you celebrate? Do you cheer? Do you clink your glass and call out a l'chaim for Israel for having fought on every front and then working to ensure that our homeland is a special place, a world-class country?

As Jews, we don't create hoopla around the battles we won, or jump with glee for the decorated soldiers who killed the enemy in battle. That is not our way. We do, however, embrace our wondrous victories, like the State of Israel that continues to stand tall and proud, despite the calls for its demise by major publications around the world. And we thank God.

To our Israeli family, we say those who predict that you will not exist do not appreciate your spirit and powerful drive to breathe. We will support you as we did then – and forever. We will do so through our prayers, our sojourns in the Holy Land, the purchase of real estate in your towns as a place of investment where we can launch our businesses, and through tzedakah.

Maximize these two days, by questioning those who do not fully grasp Israel as our lifeblood and by remembering those who fought so we could be free Jews. Am Yisrael chai. The nation of Israel lives.

Israel on alert as clashes rage in Lebanon

By YOAV STERN and BARAK RAVID
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's defence establishment has raised its intelligence alert in case Hezbollah decides to exploit its hold on Lebanon to wage an armed conflict south of the Litani River, the scene of the most intense fighting with Israel in the 2006 Lebanon war, Israeli Army Radio reported Monday.

Nevertheless, Israeli security officials are downplaying concerns of an imminent direct conflict with the Lebanon-based militant group, the radio said.

Hezbollah guerrillas seized west Beirut over the weekend and sectarian clashes had raged across Lebanon between the group and pro-government fighters loyal to western-backed Prime Minister Fouad Siniora for six consecutive days.

Heavy fighting broke out in the northern city of Tripoli on Monday, Lebanese security officials said. Officials said machine gun fire and rockets were being used in battles between government supporters and pro-Syrian gunmen. Earlier fighting in Tripoli had stopped Sunday morning. But it broke out again Monday after Lebanese troops pulled out from the area.

Lebanese paramedics also said Monday that at least 36 people were killed in clashes in a mountainous region near Beirut, bringing the death toll to 81 since the fighting began on May 7.

The scenes of skirmishes in the streets of Beirut, a once-elegant city that's still scarred from a civil war in the 1970s, sent shockwaves through the Middle East.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Rock Pioneer Dies

TORONTO — The first man to play rock 'n' roll on Canadian radio has died. Phil Stone, who aired Bill Haley's Rock Around the Clock on Toronto's CHUM in May 1957, died May 1 at 94. The Glasgow-born Stone came to Canada in 1927 and served as a public relations officer in World War II. He joined CHUM in the 1940s, and also wrote columns for local papers. In 1959, he became CHUM's vice-president, and later taught radio at Humber College, his son, Ottawa Citizen reporter Jay Stone, wrote in a tribute.

Shuls Open Doors

TORONTO — Four shuls will be among the more than 140 buildings featured in this year's Doors Open Toronto, May 24 and 25. The Kiever and Anshei Minsk synagogues in the historic Kensington Market area, as well as Congregation Knesseth Israel in Toronto's Junction area and the newly renovated home of Congregation Darchei Noam, the city's only Reconstructionist shul, will take part in the ninth annual event, which lets people tour landmark structures for free. Places of worship and national historic sites are being featured this year.

WORLD

Greetings From Space

NEW YORK — Astronaut Garrett Reisman sent greetings from space to Israel on its 60th birthday. Reisman, 40, a New Jersey engineer, is the international space station's first Jewish crew member. He's been in space since March 11. "Every time the station flies over the State of Israel, I try to find a window… it never fails to move me when I see [its] familiar outline," he said.

New OU Head Named

NEW YORK — The rabbi of the largest U.S. Orthodox shul outside the New York area was named to lead the Orthodox Union. Rabbi Steven Weil, 42, of Beth Jacob Congregation in Beverly Hills, Calif., will succeed Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb as the umbrella group's executive vice-president on July 1, 2009. The graduate of Yeshiva University's rabbinical seminary has a master's in business from New York University. His congregation has 750 member families.

Parents Win Trip

NEW YORK — Taglit-Birthright Israel awarded free trips to Israel to 16 parents of program alumni. It announced the winners May 8 of its "Let My Parents Go" contest. North American Birthright alumni were asked to submit video applications on why their parents should be given a free trip. Since 2000, Birthright has sent more than 160,000 Jews aged 18 to 26 on free 10-day trips to Israel. The videos of 60 parents were posted on Birthright's website, and the public chose the winners, all of whom are American.

Boycott Rejected

NEW YORK — Three Orthodox groups rejected calls for Jewish tourists to boycott the Beijing Olympics. The Orthodox Union, Agudath Israel of America and the National Council of Young Israel issued statements in the days after a recent call by 185 Jewish leaders – mostly clergy – to boycott the Games. The call was initiated by two Orthodox rabbis in New York, Haskel Lookstein and Irving Greenberg, who drew parallels to Germany's use of the 1936 Olympics to whitewash Nazism and noted that China is preparing a kosher kitchen for tourists. The Anti-Defamation League and the American Jewish Committee have also rejected the boycott. Other U.S. Jewish groups, including the Reform movement, want President George W. Bush to boycott the opening ceremony, which they say will have symbolic value but won't harm athletes.

Uganda Gets Rabbi

LOS ANGELES — Rabbi Gershom Sizomu will become the first officially ordained rabbi of Uganda's Abayudaya Jews. Rabbi Sizomu, like his father and grandfather, has served as the isolated African community's spiritual leader. After five years at American Jewish University in Los Angeles, he will become a Conservative rabbi May 19. Some 1,000 Abayudaya Jews live in five Ugandan villages. The group, which has been isolated from the Jewish world since its 1919 founding, based its traditions on a literal reading of the Old Testament until western rabbis visited in the mid-1990s. Most converted in 2004.

Innovative Projects To Get Grant Money

VANCOUVER — Thirty-five young Jewish activists from around the world will get seed money from a Vancouver-based agency for new innovative communal projects.

The grants, mostly $3,000 to $5,000, were announced late last month by the Center for Leadership Initiatives and will use money from a $100,000 grant pool provided by U.S. philanthropist Lynn Schusterman.

The projects are in the fields of Jewish culture, Internet content, environmental activism, tikkun olam, youth programming and Israel advocacy. They range from a course on "Torah and Modern Science" in several Russian cities and a street clean-up campaign in Jerusalem to a program to train Latin American students to represent Israel at model United Nations missions.

The grantees are former participants in the ROI global summit, a four-day workshop for young Jewish innovators sponsored by the centre and Birthright Israel that has taken place the last two summers in Jerusalem. Some 120 people are expected at this year's summit, which gives participants space and resources to develop projects aimed at furthering Jewish identity among youth, said Rabbi Yonatan Gordis, the centre's executive director. This first round of grants aims to jump-start some of the best projects.

Harper expresses 'unshakable support' for Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper told 7,000 people celebrating Israel's 60th birthday that the Jewish State has Canada's "unshakable support" because those who threaten Israel also threaten Canada.

"Unfortunately, Israel at 60 remains a country under threat, threatened by groups and regimes who deny, to this very day, its right to exist. And why? Make no mistake. Look beyond the thinly veiled rationalizations – because they hate Israel, just as much as they hate the Jewish people. Our government believes that those who threaten Israel also threaten Canada," Harper said May 8 at the Israel @ 60 event at the Ricoh Coliseum, eliciting enthusiastic applause and a standing ovation.

Harper, who is often criticized for his strong pro-Israel stance, didn't hold anything back as he spoke of Israel as being a symbol of triumph, hope and faith.

"After 1945, our battered world desperately needed to be lifted out of the forces of darkness and despair. After so much pain and suffering, we needed comfort and optimism… In short, we needed to be inspired, and it was the people that suffered most that provided that inspiration," Harper said.

"In the 60 years that followed, Israel has blossomed into one of the most successful countries on earth," he said, adding that Israel is a "miracle in the desert," committed to democracy and human rights.

Eitz Chaim celebrates 90 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eitz Chaim Schools will celebrate its 90th anniversary at a dinner at Copper Creek Golf Club May 20.

The second-oldest Jewish day school in Toronto, Eitz Chaim – like Associated Hebrew Schools, which dates back 100 years – began its existence as a supplementary school. It became a day school in the 1940s.

The Orthodox school's modest beginnings in 1917 consisted of a single teacher in a one-room cheder for boys.

Today there are 850 students from nursery to Grade 8 spread among three campuses – a girls' school in Thornhill, a boys' school on Patricia Avenue, and a second girls' school on Viewmount Avenue, the school's first day school location.

But Eitz Chaim's dean, Rabbi Isser Pliner, told The CJN he thinks that "the school probably has not drifted too far away from its original mission – to be a place where children are provided with an opportunity to have a [Torah] way of life inculcated."

In its early days, when the school was first known as the Polishe Talmud Torah, it had a heterogenous student body, but today – with the proliferation of schools serving many different segments of the community – Eitz Chaim serves families who are "committed to a lifestyle of Torah Judaism," Rabbi Pliner said.

Three years ago, following a merger with Thornhill Talmud Torah – a school that was started by Eitz Chaim parents – Eitz Chaim instituted a "Maharal" stream for boys, which involves extra study in the summer and uses a "more traditional method" of teaching Jewish subjects, focusing on knowledge of the texts per se with much review of the material.

"The point is that the children should internalize it," said Rabbi Pliner.

He noted that the Maharal students are integrated into all school programming. "At the end of the day they're Eitz Chaim kids and Eitz Chaim families."

The rabbi, who headed a school in Pittsburgh before moving to Toronto six years ago, said that Eitz Chaim "still sees itself in the centre of its [Orthodox] community, but the community's centre has moved to the right. If it remained the way it was 30 or 40 years ago, it wouldn't be in the centre. It would be left-wing."

Rabbi Pliner said the school is a "very modern, progressive, professionally run school" with "a very strong secular program," special education resource programs, state-of-the-art libraries, and most recently, the beginning use of SMART Boards, interactive technology that opens new learning possibilities in the classroom.

He said the school, which is serving its fourth generation of students in some cases, has been a "trendsetter" in developing seven-foot-high replicas of Gemarah pages for use on the wall in beginning boys' Gemarah classes. (Girls do not learn Gemarah at the school.)

In the 1920s Eitz Chaim took what at the time was also a progressive step, opening a separate girls' class and hiring a female teacher for them.

Pauline Esco, née Spiegel, who was born in Poland and arrived in Canada at age 8 in 1936, remembers learning how to read Hebrew at D'Arcy Talmud Torah some 70 years ago when she was about 10 years old. "We started from the bottom: aleph bet and everything.

"There are great memories. The teacher [Celia Levitan, later Frisch] was wonderful. She had a lot of patience. But we didn't get the training they do now [at Jewish day schools]. After school the kids were tired mentally and physically. You were anxious to get home for supper. There were no day schools at that time."

The school "taught us something, and it remained with us," said Esco, who grew up in a traditional Jewish home. Going to synagogue on Shabbat is "part of me," she added.

By the time Esco was a student, the school had moved from its first downtown home, the Elm Street Shul, where classes were held after public school on weekdays for six hours and for another six hours on Sundays. Classes ran throughout the school year as well as in the summer.

There were subsequent homes downtown before the school purchased a building on D'Arcy Street. The latter building was rebuilt after a 1927 fire, and classes went from four hours to two hours but maintained a strong emphasis on Talmud, according to a history provided by the school.

The history, which will be reproduced in a journal for the dinner, is enhanced by reminiscences written by the school's first principal, Rabbi Leibish Noble, who remained involved with the school for 40 years. His comments, translated from the original Yiddish, first appeared in a 25th anniversary journal in 1943, said Gloria Silver, the school's development co-ordinator.

For further information about the dinner, call the dinner hotline at 416-225-1187, ext. 31 or e-mail dinner@eitzchaim.com. The event is a fundraiser honouring the Joseph & Faye Tanenbaum Charitable Foundation, and will feature guest speaker Rabbi Shmuel Kamenetsky of the Talmudical Yeshiva of Philadelphia, an Eitz Chaim alumnus.

Israel is jihadists' main target, journalist says

Palestinians have created 'largest terror base in the world'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Islamic jihadists have targeted Israel as the key front-line state in the war of terror they are waging against the West, according to the deputy managing editor of the Jerusalem Post, Caroline Glick.

Speaking at Holy Blossom Temple last week, she said Muslim radicals regard Israel as the first western nation to be eliminated in their campaign to establish "global domination."

They hate Israel because it's a Jewish state and an outpost of freedom, said Glick, an American from Chicago who made aliyah in 1991 and then served as an assistant foreign policy adviser to Benjamin Netanyahu when he was Israel's prime minister.

Glick, the author The Shackled Warrior: Israel and the Global Jihad, published two months ago by Gefen, said the current Israeli government refuses to acknowledge the Islamic threat.

Israel can defeat its Islamic enemies, but only if it looks "at reality in the eye" and rebuts the increasingly heard argument that Muslim rage is driven by Israeli settlements in the territories and Israel's refusal to make concessions to the Palestinians.

Glick, a syndicated columnist and a former officer in the Israel Defence Forces, belittled the claim that the absence of a Palestinian state explains why Islamists have launched a jihad.

The Palestinians have been offered statehood since the 1930s, but have rejected each offer, she observed.

Given the international funds they have received in recent years, the Palestinians could already have built a state.

Instead, they have constructed "the largest terror base in the world," she said, referring to the Gaza Strip, which Israel evacuated in 2005.

If the Palestinians really sought statehood, they would not have elected a Hamas government in 2006.

She denounced Hamas as "a genocidal terror organization" intent on wiping out Israel, and she accused Hamas of building a Taliban-style state instead of "a new Singapore" in Gaza.

In a diatribe aimed at Palestinian leaders, Glick charged that they're dedicated to destroying Israel rather than building a civil society.

Blasting Saudi Arabia for financing jihadist forces and spreading Muslim anti-Semitism, Glick singled out Iran as the country behind the war of terrorism.

She added that senior Al Qaeda officials operate openly in Iran.

Iran fights Israel through surrogates, Hamas in Gaza and the West Bank and Hezbollah in Lebanon, she noted.

For all intents and purposes, Hezbollah is Iran's "foreign legion," while Hamas is "an Iranian proxy" financed to the tune of some $100 million annually, she added. "This is the system that Israel is fighting."

Turning to Syria, Iran's ally, Glick said it has ceased to be an independent nation and is now "an Iranian colony" whose military is essentially under Iran's control.

Caroline Glick

Without Iran's annual subsidy of $1 billion, Syria would be "an economic basket case."

The secret Syrian nuclear reactor destroyed by Israel last September was financed by Iran, she said.

During a question-and-answer session, Glick argued that Israel has nothing to fear from Christian Zionists whose goal is to convert Jews to Christianity.

"We should be nice to them," she said, minimizing their long-term objective.

Saying that Israel desperately needs fresh elections so that it can embark on a new direction, Glick named Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu and Moshe Ya'alon, the former Israeli chief of staff, as credible alternatives to the incumbent Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert.

Gratifying and grateful

The commemoration of Israel's 60th birthday began last week. Celebrations and special observances of this magical milestone event will be held throughout the coming year in communities around the world and especially, of course, in the Jewish state itself.

It is fitting however, that we make special mention of the large and heartening community rallies that were held across the country last week and commend the organizers and the participants for uninhibited, enthusiastic displays of love and support for the people of Israel, and the achievements of that remarkable, tiny country during the past six decades.

But we must also note with particular gratitude Canada's signal support for the Jewish state.

Before thousands of demonstratively appreciative celebrants in Toronto last week, Prime Minister Stephen Harper once again expressed his government's "unshakable support" for Israel. "Our government believes that those who threaten Israel also threaten Canada," Harper said. "Israel has blossomed into one of the most successful countries on earth," the prime minister added.

In Montreal, the leader of the Opposition, Stéphane Dion, told some 15,000 celebrants that "Israel is a country that has enriched our global community with its vibrant culture, its powers of invention, and its commitment to freedom, democracy, and prosperity."

In Ottawa, the House of Commons unanimously agreed to a motion tabled by Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, and seconded by 20 members of parliament (the maximum allowed), that reaffirms and re-articulates the unique bond between Canada and Israel.

The full text of the resolution is worthy of note: "That the House: (a) recognize the historic significance of the 60th anniversary of the reconstitution of the sovereign and independent State of Israel as a homeland for the Jewish people; (b) reaffirm its support for Israel as Israel pursues peace with its neighbours; (c) reaffirm its support for Israel's right to defend itself against threats to its existence and security; (d) commend the people of Israel for their achievements in building a new state and a pluralistic, democratic society in the face of hostilities; (e) reaffirm the bonds of friendship and co-operation between Canada and Israel, and commit to strengthening those bonds; and (f) extend the warmest congratulations and best wishes to the State of Israel and the Israeli people for a secure and prosperous future at peace with her neighbours."

In a world often made disheartening and confusing by concerted efforts to delegitimize and demonize the Jewish state, it is very gratifying and heartwarming to hear and to read such deeply rooted statements of support for Israel such as those expressed last week by the government and the parliament of Canada.

In last week's editorial, we wrote that Yigael Yadin was Israel's first chief of staff. In fact, he was the second.

Ya'akov Dori was the first.

25 years ago in The CJN

A total of 13,176 immigrants came to Israel in 1982, up 14 per cent over 1981, with the main source of olim being western countries. Immigration from the Soviet Union, the largest reservoir of potential immigrants, remained very low, the Knesset was told as it opened its summer session with a debate on aliyah.

Machal volunteer recalls 1948

Now, 60 years later, I recall the "welcome" I received on landing in Haifa as a volunteer to serve in the War of Independence, with several others who were posing as tourists on June 6, 1948.

I fell into conversation with a British major who said, "You're bloody crazy coming here at this time. Don't you know what's going on?" As calmly as possible, I replied that we were on a world tour that included passing through the new Israel. I will never forget how, pointing toward Haifa port, he gloated and said, "That's where the Arabs are slaughtering the f—ing Jews. We're pulling out, but it won't take two weeks before the Jews will beg us to rescue them."

No sooner had Israel declared independence on May 15, 1948, than five Arab armies invaded the nascent state.

About 3,500 overseas volunteers came from 43 different countries to assist in Israel's struggle for survival. They were referred to collectively as "Machal," an acronym of the Hebrew equivalent of "volunteers from abroad."

Several Machal groups came to Israel together with displaced persons on overcrowded refugee ships. One group sailed in the Dolores, a boat designed to accommodate 50 people, but carried 149. South African Machal volunteer, the late Dr. Alan Price, assisted by Evelyn Bernstein, delivered a baby in the captain's cabin. With the assistance of Joe Woolf, Price succeeded in tracing and meeting this "baby," who was then living in Kiryat Bialik, during Israel's 50th birthday celebrations.

It is indeed a privilege to celebrate the 60th birthday of the miraculously re-created Israel, after 2,000 years without a state of our own.

March of the Living, 2008

My daughter, Ashley Bitton, and her two first cousins, Myles Schwartz and Josh Raisin, recently left on the March of the Living, 2008. They represent three of the 13 grandchildren of Holocaust survivors Jack and Roma Buchman.

Two days before liberation in 1945, my father's mother was murdered by the Nazis in front of his eyes. My father was 13. His family was able to preserve her remains and have her buried.

Before my daughter and her cousins left for Poland, my father described to them where his mother, Pola Buchman, was buried and asked, if there was time, could they visit their great-grandmother's grave.

After an eight-hour plane ride to Warsaw, with a six-hour time difference, these teenagers began to tour immediately. Their first stop was at the Gensha Cemetery. The three young people wandered around looking for their great-grandmother's name. When they stood by her grave, they were suddenly enveloped by the entire group. They held hands as they sobbed and told the story of the great-grandmother whom they never knew. Together with the group, our children recited Kaddish. Yesterday was their grandfather's 76th birthday. What a profound gift they gave to him 60 years later!

Let the Nazis start hiding!

My family, including myself, managed to flee Austria one day before German troops invaded our beautiful country.

There I was in November 1943, hiding in the small town of Wasseiges in Belgium, equipped with false identification. I even had a job at the local sugar mill. My parents had been taken by the Gestapo three months earlier, not knowing about the death camps. I, of course, expected them to return.

That's when things started to go wrong again. The Belgian resistance had cut some of the German telephone wires. Normally, for any act of sabotage, the Germans would shoot 10 hostages from the nearest town, but the officer in charge must have been a bit more humane. He came to see the mayor of our town and ordered that those wires were to be guarded night and day, or else.

My services were volunteered. With two other fellows, I sat under those wires during many a night, and because it was cold and windy, we built a wall against the wind from oblong straw bundles and made a fire. Once our straw wall caught fire and nearly burned those wires down.

I had a few more close calls, but about a year later, while riding my bike on a forest road, I encountered a strange, topless vehicle with two soldiers who asked me in English, "Are there any Germans here." My English was just good enough to say "no." So that jeep with its two Americans drove off.

After four years of hiding from the Nazis, with probably my life at stake, that 30 seconds facing that jeep had turned the tables on the Nazis. Let them start hiding. I had survived.

Modern Orthodoxy decides to fight back

By RABBI MARTIN LOCKSHIN

In 2006, the Canadian Jewish News ran a series of articles on modern Orthodox Judaism. Many readers saw those articles as evidence of the decline of modern Orthodoxy and its gradual replacement by more haredi types of Orthodox Judaism.

Those so inclined might find even more evidence now that modern Orthodoxy is in trouble. A number of issues have arisen recently, but none is of more concern than conflicts concerning conversion.

Here in Israel, where I am spending my sabbatical from York University, rabbinic courts have state sanction and rabbis are often appointed to them as political favours. As haredi political parties have grown in size and the National Religious Party has shrunk, state rabbinic courts are increasingly run by rabbis who are inimical to the values of modernity and unconcerned about the issues of Israeli society at large.

One of the most vexing social problems in Israel is that under the Law of Return, a large number of people have immigrated here who have some Jewish lineage, but are not halachically Jewish. The structure of the state is such that haredim do not have control over immigration, but they do have control of the marriage, divorce and, to a large extent, burial systems. Since civil marriage does not exist in Israel, there are now presumably hundreds of thousands of Israeli citizens who cannot marry or divorce legally and cannot be buried in many of the country's cemeteries.

While a more global solution to this problem is needed, a few modern Orthodox rabbis in Israel have been taking small but significant steps to solve the problem. The Conversion Authority, run by Rabbi Haim Druckman, the rosh yeshivah of Yeshivat Or Etzion, simplifies the conversion process for these Israeli citizens. They study about Judaism and must show commitment to observance, yet many of them do not adopt full observance in an Orthodox manner. But as Zvi Zohar and Avi Sagi have proven in a number of books and articles in Hebrew, and most recently in an English book (Transforming Identity: The Ritual Transition from Gentile to Jew, 2008), the claim that conversion is conditional on total observance is neither the universal nor even the majority opinion in halachic literature. Rabbi Druckman and his colleagues have ruled that for people who throw in their lot with the Jewish people, move to Israel and agree that they and their children will risk their lives in the Israel Defence Forces protecting Jews from their enemies, conversion can be based on incomplete observance of the laws of Orthodox Judaism.

A number of months ago, a messy divorce case in the Israeli city of Ashdod set off an incredible chain of events. The wife had converted to Judaism through Rabbi Druckman's court 15 years earlier. The husband argued in the local (haredi-controlled) rabbinic court that he should not be required to make any settlement with his estranged wife or give her a religious divorce (get), since they were never really married under Jewish law. He argued that she was still a gentile, as she had never really converted with sincerity. The local rabbinic court ruled that her conversion with Rabbi Druckman should be retroactively annulled, that she was still a gentile, that her husband was unattached and that their three children were also gentiles (since their mother was a gentile).

The case was appealed to the high rabbinic court in Jerusalem, led by the haredi Rabbi Avraham Sherman. In a 38-page ruling Rabbi Sherman's court upheld the ruling of the lower court and went further: it ruled that all conversions done by Rabbi Druckman's courts were to be considered null and void. In fact, all converts who come to be married in Israel should be scrutinized. If they do not have the "look" of a religious Jew, their conversion papers, from any religious court in any country, would not be considered sufficient grounds to allow them to marry.

From left, Yose Benarroch, Avigail Zohar and the author, Rabbi Martin Lockshin, hold a sign that reads: "It is time for a rabbinate that takes everyone into account." The three carried the sign at a demonstration last week near the Knesset while the Knesset committee on law and the constitution were deliberating on the latest conversion scandal. [Ruth Lockshin photo]

Such an approach is shocking, to put it mildly. As Sagi and Zohar's book proves, the idea of retroactively annulling conversions and of considering all conversions conditional on observance for the rest of the converts' lives is not supported by the force of the halachic literature over the ages. It is a bludgeon being used for political ends.

Orthodox conversion is also a hot issue in North America. Recently the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), the premier organization of "centrist Orthodox" rabbis, announced serious changes in its policies.

No longer will the RCA stand behind the conversions done by their members in local communities, unless they're done by members who were specifically appointed as conversion-worthy rabbis by rabbis Herschel Shachter and Mordechai Willig, roshei yeshivah at Yeshiva University in New York. (Rabbi Shachter is no stranger to controversy concerning modern Orthodoxy – among other notorious statements, he called the modern Orthodox organization, Edah, "a sort of internal Amalek," referring to the Jews' prototypical enemy, whom the Torah commands all generations to eradicate.)

A rather short list of conversion-worthy rabbis has since been circulated, along with a new set of standards for such conversions, which represent a significant departure from past practice. To give but one example, until recently, it was possible to find RCA rabbis who would convert the adopted baby of two Jewish parents even if the parents were not Sabbath observant. Following the new RCA standards, that is no longer possible. Many people, myself included, see this as one of a series of regrettable moves by the RCA to the right of the religious spectrum.

The RCA has vociferously defended its tightening of conversion standards and its move to centralization as crucial steps toward ensuring that its converts will be recognized in Israel. But now, after Rabbi Sherman's ruling, it's hard to imagine that the RCA can count on that. If Rabbi Druckman's converts can be thrown out by Rabbi Sherman's high rabbinical court, why should any RCA rabbi think that his converts are safe?

So there are many reasons to feel that modern Orthodoxy is under attack. But perhaps the attack is responsible in part for some exciting recent developments.

In the last week of April, the founding conference of the International Rabbinic Fellowship took place in Florida. I had the pleasure of being one of 85 Orthodox rabbis who gathered to discuss how modern Orthodoxy can be revived and can make a contribution to the Jewish people.

The inspiring conference was organized by Rabbi Marc Angel, a former president of the RCA and author of some 20 books on Jewish law and philosophy, and by Rabbi Avi Weiss, rabbi of the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale, a well-known political activist and author most recently of Spiritual Activism. One of the sponsors of the conference was Rabbi Angel's Institute for Jewish Ideas and Ideals (www.jewishideas.org).

Most of the rabbis at the conference were RCA members who have no plans to resign from the RCA, but have sadly concluded that a different framework is required to advance our modern Orthodox agenda. Six rabbis came from Israel for this conference, including the roshei yeshivah of two Israeli yeshivot. Seventeen of the North American rabbis present (including two from Canada) were graduates of the new "open Orthodox" Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, whose graduates are not welcome in the RCA. (According to the Jewish Week of May 1, 2008, Rabbi Schacter "threatened to resign from the RCA if any Chovevei Torah rabbis were admitted to the group.")

As a veteran of conferences, I must say that I found the Rabbinic Fellowship refreshing even from a structural perspective. All sessions were held in the same room, with rabbis sitting at tables arranged in a square. There was no head table or dais. Formal presentations were limited to 15 or 20 minutes, and the majority of time in each session was dedicated to open group discussion. This structure reflects one of the crucial values of the Fellowship – a non-authoritarian approach in which each rabbi has autonomy to do what is appropriate for his community without necessarily answering to an authority figure far away.

Not surprisingly, the 85 rabbis did not agree on everything. But they discussed the important issues of Judaism today in a friendly, respectful atmosphere that was free of intimidation. On many crucial issues, there was agreement: on the need to work hard to create an intellectually vibrant Orthodoxy, to be responsive to issues related to women and to put an alternative system of conversion in place. They also agreed that Orthodox rabbis should speak out and be activists on issues other than Israel or the details of Jewish law, since Judaism has much to say about other problems in the world. There was also a great desire to have Orthodox synagogues and institutions where all Jews would feel welcome, even those who choose to live non-Orthodox lives.

The timing of the conference could hardly have been better. The first public act of the Fellowship was to excoriate the high rabbinical court in Jerusalem for its cynical ruling, promulgated on the day that the conference ended. (Four days later, the RCA also issued a strong statement condemning Rabbi Sherman's court.)

I personally found it exhilarating that there were so many Orthodox rabbis who shared the modern Orthodox agenda and who were willing and eager to work to advance these ideas. Who knows? Perhaps the flagrant behaviour of the high rabbinic court in Jerusalem will be enough to wake people up to the need for an alternative form of Orthodox Judaism.

Differing on campus realities

We live in a culture in which survey results tend to command more attention than they're worth, often at the expense of truth and common sense. A penchant for tidily packaged, quantifiable "evidence" gets in the way of recognizing the obvious or questioning what the pundits would have us believe.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Take the situation at Canadian universities, for example. In early February, Israeli Apartheid Week commanded our attention, morphing this year into a strategically more ominous format than ever before. Its aftermath, right up until the end of the current school year, has been unsettling, with incident after ugly incident of intimidation directed at anyone who stands up against the wanton vilification of Israel and its supporters.

For those who are actually on campus and who have had to deal with the day-to-day onslaughts, a new and troubling reality has emerged. No longer can we rely on the tenets of free speech to defend the interests of the entirety of students and faculty, particularly the Jewish minority. Instead, we have witnessed abuses of free speech that university administrations seem unable to confront.

Of even greater concern is that what now passes as freedom of expression even seems to take precedence over mechanisms that most universities use to ensure the well-being of their students.

At McMaster University, the faculty association is now requesting a review of what it regards as inconsistencies between restrictions expressed in the Student Code of Conduct and the university's "overarching" statement on academic freedom. The "restrictions" referred to are, by the way, the very devices that, according to the code, protect students against actions that "may be considered intimidating, harassing or offensive."

The Canadian campus environment, rampant as it is with Israel haters, has seldom been as hostile to Jewish students and faculty – and there can be little doubt that the abomination of Israeli Apartheid Week has provided the ideological fuel for what's happened. Far from receding, this cancer has spread and become more virulent.

What remains incongruous, however, is that our mainstream Jewish leadership apparently opted for a low-key approach right from the outset, hoping that the problems we've been facing would somehow abate if only we avoid drawing attention to them.

This attitude has not changed. Just a few weeks ago, an audience in Hamilton was told that, based on available research, Israeli Apartheid Week activities had been shown to be in decline this past year. And the same message has been touted repeatedly by others in our advocacy agencies.

Surveys say it, so therefore it must be true, right? Well, not necessarily. The facts on the ground speak thunderously for themselves, as recent events have clearly demonstrated. How much louder does the wake-up call need to be?

No strangers to the cost of war

The following is an excerpt from the address by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at the state memorial ceremony for Israel's fallen soldiers on Mount Herzl, on Yom Hazikaron, May 7.

The memorial siren was heard throughout the country, and the hustle and bustle of life in the State of Israel stopped for one clear, crystallized moment of unity with the memory of Israel's fallen soldiers, and compassion and solidarity with the bereaved families.

At military cemeteries and military plots, many are now gathering – good, loyal citizens of the State of Israel stand bowed and quiet, with sorrow in their eyes...

On this special day, all the barriers fade, and the sense of unity and shared destiny is stronger than at any other time. Memorial Day for Israel's Fallen Soldiers is a sad day, but void of any discord, and very Israeli. Anyone who identifies with this country, its flag and values, anyone whose home is Israel, anyone who is a partner to the essence of life in Israel, even if he is, at this moment, at the other end of the universe, will feel, deep down in his heart, the spirit of this day and will sense the pain. There is almost no one in Israel who is a stranger to the cost of war, no one who will today not remember a family member, a friend or acquaintance from among the fallen...

Each and every one of you, dear families, has a permanent address, one that belongs only to you, among the rows of stone. A humble, uniform stone, indistinguishable by rank, be it a private or a major-general, a small square stone, carved out of rock, carrying identification details. Only you, family members, share the world of your loved one who was lost. You see before you his image, his face, his smile, fragments of moving pictures from different times – a baby growing into a child, a boy, a man, a soldier... The silent stone is adorned with flowers and is moist from the tears, and the longings are endless.

I will not speak words of solace, as there is no remedy for the grief. I will, however, express the nation's unbounded gratitude for the spirit of heroism and sacrifice that your loved ones demonstrated by coming to the defence of this people and this country. Our entire national existence, and the safety and well-being of Israeli citizens, depend upon our willingness to defend ourselves, fight for our just principles and vital interests, respond against our aggressors and foil our enemies' schemes. Your sons and daughters, Israel's fallen soldiers, gave their lives for the most supreme goal, and we, citizens of this country on whose watch they fell, will forever carry in our hearts a debt of honour and glory towards them, and an honest sense of humility and love for you...

Our war is indeed long, and the State of Israel's 60 years of existence, as well as what preceded it, are all represented here among the marble stones. However, it is peace, not war, that we yearn for and crave. Our forefathers' decree and our legacy, "seek and pursue peace," is translated by us into political action and a willingness to make essential compromises, as this is also the decree of the fallen and the decree of the pain and agony in the hearts of the bereaved families. Another decree of the fallen, which is to us the decree of life, is that we will defend the security of the State of Israel with all our might, without any hesitation or capitulation.

Among the casualties of war, those injured in body and soul, are many of the IDF's wounded and disabled soldiers. We wish them recovery and rehabilitation. We will make every possible and responsible effort to bring our kidnapped and missing soldiers home soon.

Today our flags fly at half mast, and as the evening dawns and we enter the gates of our 60th Independence Day, we will know that the value of our State of Israel is as high as the cost, the immeasurable cost of its revival and defence.

May the souls of Israel's fallen soldiers be forever bound to our lives, and may their memory be blessed.

Why Israel will survive and thrive

The latest fashion in Israel-bashing, coinciding with the 60th anniversary of Israel's independence, takes the form of pronouncements predicting the demise of the Jewish state. Maclean's, for example, has weighed in with a deliberately provocative headline, claiming to examine "Why Israel can't survive," and the Atlantic Monthly, only slightly less offensively, asks "Is Israel finished?"

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The good news is that these articles and their authors will be long forgotten when Israel celebrates its 120th anniversary.

Journalists, academics, diplomats and just about everyone else have bad track records in explaining and forecasting international politics, and this is particularly true when it comes to Israel and the Middle East. Most become instant experts after a few weeks, or perhaps months, in a place whose language they don't understand, and whose history is far too complex for them to grasp. They rely on a few carefully selected "experts," with their own particular spin, and follow the rest of the pack.

When it comes to Israel, most pundits get stuck on the surface, without digging deeper to understand the essential nature of Zionism – maintaining the hard-won restoration of Jewish national sovereignty and equality among the nations of the world. In 1948, the experts, including the major military and political leaders of that time, confidently predicted a quick end to the newborn State of Israel, which they said would quickly be crushed by the Arab armies. The 600,000 Israelis who defeated these attacks, at the very high cost of more than 6,000 deaths – one per cent of the entire population – recognized that there was no other option for the Jewish people.

Fifty years later, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat made the same mistake, believing the newspaper articles, including Israel's own self-deprecating and politically correct talking heads, that propounded "post-Zionism." Yes, Israelis appeared (and still seem to be) very divided and seemed to have become absorbed in European (and North American) consumer culture. But when the Palestinian mass terror attacks mounted, everyone reported for duty, and, under former prime minister Ariel Sharon's leadership, the Israel Defence Forces did what was necessary to restore security and defeat this campaign.

This is not to say that Israel doesn't face serious challenges over the next 60 years – we still have more than our share, and many of them are of our own making.

An outdated electoral system has produced a generation of corrupt and incompetent politicians, and both the process and the personalities are likely to be replaced in the next few years. From the outside, the Middle East remains a very hostile and violent region. Iran and its allies – Hezbollah and Hamas – are the latest variation on the late Egyptian president Gamel Abdel Nasser's threat to "push the Jews into the sea." Nearby, the chaos in Iraq threatens to spill over into Jordan, while the Egyptian military regime, which is Israel's other (problematic) peace partner, may be on the verge of internal collapse. But these are all threats that Israel can deter, defeat or preempt.

The Maclean's article, like most overly clichéd journalistic and diplomatic accounts, focuses on the Palestinians, the "occupation," demography and what is presented as the inevitable clash between Israel as a Jewish and a democratic state. But as often happens in such ideologically targeted analyses, the dynamics of history are erased, and what Palestinians refer to as the "one-state solution" is presented as inevitable. The author, Michael Petrou, has selected a few people for quotation in order to "prove" his pre-determined conclusion. And in the process, he has created a very misleading tableau.

In reality, for many years, Israelis have recognized that the "one-state solution," and the potential for a majority Palestinian population in 60 years, is a political attempt to "wipe Israel off the map." As in the case of the threat posed by a nuclear Iran, we know that our survival depends on a strategy that will avoid Palestinian "rejectionism," through a combination of hard-nosed diplomacy and unilateral actions, such as the construction of the West Bank separation barrier.

After 2,000 years of exile, the Jewish people have no intention of losing our very hard-won independence, sovereign equality among the nations, and the ability to control our own destiny.

Now, as in 1948, there is no other option.

The Kirshner File

A magisterial account of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war

On Nov. 30, 1947, in response to a historic United Nations resolution passed the day before calling for the partition of Palestine into two sovereign states, one Jewish and the other Arab, Palestinian Arabs launched a series of violent attacks on Jews throughout the country. These were the opening shots of a war that started as a limited Arab-Jewish civil war and escalated into a full-scale conflict almost six months later when five Arab armies invaded Palestine to exterminate the new Jewish state of Israel.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Benny Morris, an Israeli historian, has written a magisterial account of the War of Independence, 1948: The First Arab-Israeli War (Yale University Press). Morris, a specialist on the struggle between Zionism and Palestinian nationalism, has produced a densely researched, richly textured, nuanced book brimming with discerning analysis and telling details. Although he writes from a pro-Zionist point of view, he tries to be scrupulously fair, and 1948 is thus the antithesis of propaganda. It will be mandatory reading for the foreseeable future, at least until Arab archives are opened to historians.

As he points out, the considered judgment of experts in Britain, the mandatory power in Palestine, was that the Jews could not prevail and "would be thrown out." The Palestinians had a 2-1 population advantage and enjoyed the advantage of high ground and pan-Arab support. The British, however, glossed over Jewish strengths. The Yishuv, the Jewish community of Palestine, was better prepared in terms of national organization, trained military manpower, morale and motivation and command and control.

During the first phase of the fighting, from November 1947 to March 1948, the Arabs took and held the initiative, while the Haganah – the main Jewish force – was on the defensive. There were really no front lines, pitched battles or conquests of territory. Much of the fighting took place in and around Jerusalem, Tel Aviv-Jaffa and Haifa, in areas earmarked for Jewish statehood, and was dispersed, disorganized and highly localized.

Prior to its withdrawal on May 15, Britain, with about 100,000 troops in Palestine, generally hewed to a policy of impartiality and non-intervention.

The tide turned in April when the Haganah, bolstered by arms shipments from Czechoslovakia and a successful recruitment drive, went on the offensive.

The Jewish leadership, headed by David Ben-Gurion, decreed that no Jewish settlement should be evacuated and should be held to the last fighter. As well, Ben-Gurion refused to define the new state's borders, arguing that it would be demarcated by events on the ground. Under the UN partition plan, the Jews, constituting 55 per cent of Palestine's pre-war population, were allotted 56 per cent of the land.

Palestinian military power was based on local militias in 400 of 800 Arab villages and towns. Villages and towns in the West Bank barely contributed to the war effort and were untouched by hostilities. Some Arab villages, particularly those with Druze inhabitants on Mount Carmel and the western Galilee, threw in their lot with the Jews, believing that they would win.

Both sides were reinforced by foreign volunteers. Upward of 8,000 Arabs from Egypt, Syria and Iraq joined the Arab Liberation Army, the largest, best-organized Palestinian force, led by Fawzi al-Qawugji. They were augmented by several dozen British deserters, Bosnian Muslims and a handful of former Nazi intelligence, army and SS officers. On the Jewish side, 3,000 to 4,000 volunteers, the vast majority of whom were Jewish, flocked in from all corners of the globe, including Canada and the United States.

Morris dwells at length on the Palestinian refugee problem. Within 24 hours of the eruption of fighting, Arab families in big towns began leaving, usually bound for neighbouring Arab countries. By March 1948, he notes, most wealthy and middle-class Palestinians had left Jaffa, Haifa, western Jerusalem and the heavily Jewish coastal plain. Many Arabs assumed that they would return once the war wound down. He estimates that 75,000 to 100,000 fled or were displaced during the first stage of the war.

Morris concludes that there was no systematic master plan to expel Arabs, though outright expulsions occurred. Jewish commanders were given carte blanche to conquer Arab villages and decide each village's fate – destruction and expulsion or occupation.

In one notable case, the Jewish mayor of Haifa, Shabtai Levy, begged Arab inhabitants to stay, but to no avail, leaving only 5,000 Arabs in the city.

By the spring of 1948, after 5½ months of battles, the Jews had the upper hand, having captured land that the United Nations had assigned to the Palestinians. According to Morris, these defeats, plus the exodus of Arabs from their homes and the massacre at Deir Yassin, prompted Arab states to intervene. Despite their bluster, Arab leaders, with the striking exception of King Abdullah of Transjordan, did almost nothing to prepare for the great battle ahead. Abdullah's goal was not to destroy Israel but to seize the West Bank. He reportedly said, "The Jews are too strong, it is a mistake to make war."

The invading Arab armies consisted of some 25,000 combat troops: 5,500 Egyptians, 4,500 Jordanians, 2,750 Syrians, 2,700 Iraqis and 2,000 Lebanese, supplemented by Arab air force personnel and Palestinian irregulars. Contingents from Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Yemen and Sudan contributed a further 68,000 soldiers. None of the armies, save the Arab Legion from Jordan, had ever fought in a war. The Arab armies were severely underequipped and left large numbers of their soldiers at home to guard against internal rebellion and upheaval.

The 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan

Israel fielded 65,000 troops, or 13 per cent of its population, by July. It amassed 108,000 troops by January 1949, when the war effectively ended.

Shortly after the May 14 Arab invasion, the UN Security Council imposed a global arms embargo on the combatants. Morris says it hurt the Arabs more than the Jews because the Arab side had not expected an embargo and failed to stockpile weaponry, ammunition and spare parts. Jews, in the meantime, scoured the globe for arms, buying them from both states and private dealers.

Apart from establishing a Jewish state and surviving the Arab onslaught, the Yishuv's war aims were two-fold: to capture additional territory and thereby create more defensible borders and to reduce the proportion of its Arab residents. Under the partition plan, the Jewish state would have had 600,000 Jews and 500,000 Arabs, including bedouins.

During the first four weeks of the war, the strategic initiative passed into Israel's hands and Israel added to its territorial holdings. Yet Israel lost the Jewish quarter in eastern Jerusalem; failed in counterattacks in Latrun, Isdud and Jenin; and lost the Etzion bloc and Kibbutz Mishmar Hayarden. At the last moment, Lebanon opted out of the invasion, probably due to Maronite Christian disaffection with Arab League policy on Zionism, but deployed its army defensively.

In the rest of his book, Morris discusses Israel's battlefield triumphs – the conquest of Lod, Ramla, Be'er Sheva and the Negev – the little-known air and naval wars; Israel's short-lived invasion of Lebanon; the armistice agreements with four Arab belligerents; Israel's seminal and controversial decision not to allow back Palestinian refugees; and the atrocities committed by both sides.

The 1948 war gave Israel hardly any respite, and for the past 60 years, Israel has fought a succession of skirmishes and wars, with no end in sight. Peace may be possible one day, but for now, Israel fights for its survival.

Israel Bonds honours War of Independence vet

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sixty years after Gabi Weisfeld fought in Israel's War of Independence, she is being honoured with State of Israel Bond's Golda Meir Leadership Award.

She will receive the award, presented to women who have distinguished themselves in their chosen field and in support of Israel, on May 21 at Bonds' annual Golda Meir Luncheon, to be held at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. Following the luncheon, guests will attend a performance of My Fair Lady.

Raquel Benzacar Savatti, director of Bonds' women's division, said that it's "very special" to honour a woman who fought for Israel's survival 60 years ago.

Weisfeld was born in Germany but immigrated to Palestine at age two with her family, where she later joined the Haganah. She moved with her first husband, Robert Abrahami, to New York in 1956, and eventually to Toronto in 1962, where she taught Hebrew and became involved in Canadian Hadassah-WIZO.

Abrahami died in 1967, and in 1971, Gabi married Louis Weisfeld, a garment manufacturer, real estate developer and philanthropist who dedicated a number of projects to Bar-Ilan University.

Since Louis' death in 1996, Weisfeld has continued her commitment to Israel and, among a number of projects, has established the Gabi and Louis Weisfeld Fellowship for IDF Combat Veterans at Bar-Ilan, and established the Bar-Ilan school of social work in her and her late husband's name.

She serves on the university's international board of trustees, is the national president of Canadian Friends of Bar Ilan University, and is a benefactor of Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Gabi Weisfeld

Weisfeld said she feels blessed to have her own name connected to that of Golda Meir. "After the War of Independence, we moved to Ashkelon, where my daughter was the first Jewish child to be born in the area in 2,000 years. I have a picture of Golda Meir, then minister of labour, handing the keys to our new house to my husband."

She is also honoured to accept the award, "because in one sense, Israel is my home. We as the Jewish people have to have a homeland, and it takes more than just living there to help," she said.

"It is important that Jews around the world consider Israel to be their spiritual home."

She has been attached to State of Israel Bonds, she said, since her first husband, Abrahami, was a spokesperson for the organization. "He travelled from city to city in the United States and raised more than $30 million in bonds. That was the start of my Bonds connection."

Benzacar Savatti said Bonds chooses honorees who can serve as a good example to other women. "Gabi doesn't only give now. She gave as a young person when she had [little.] We need [other] young people to be inspired by women like her."

McGuinty honours nine survivors

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty last week joined the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem in a Holocaust memorial service at Queen's Park that paid tribute to nine survivors who have contributed significantly to their communities.

Michael Chan, the minister of citizenship and immigration, and Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter, presented scrolls of recognition May 5 to the survivors, who immigrated to and built new lives in Ontario, and made outstanding contributions.

The survivors honoured at the event were Tamara Erlich, Al Gelfant, Sol Kafka, Jerry Kapelus, Shifra Knobel, Mike Mayer, Johanan Steinberg, Jack Weinbaum and Severin Weingort.

Kapelus survived Buchenwald, and was liberated along with Nobel Peace Prize laureate Eli Wiesel and Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel.

As an adult, Kapelus ran a women's clothing store and later worked for London Life insurance.

"I felt quite excited and honoured," Kapelus said. "I did not expect it. It came as a pleasant surprise."

He described the mixed emotions of the event. "Some of the memories came back of some of the bad times we went through. The good emotions were that we survived. The therapists at the time told us we'd all grow up to be psychopaths, criminals and killers, because of the horrors we went through. We proved them wrong. We all grew up to be good citizens. Those of us who survived the Buchenwald camp, we even meet up every five years, in a different spot in the world."

In 1995, the premier of Ontario began recognizing Holocaust survivors for their contributions to the province, said Gillian Weintraub, event organizer for Yad Vashem.

Honorees are nominated by friends and family.

"It was a very solemn event," Weintraub said. "Some of the survivors may not like to hear their stories as public record. But it's important for future generations and to make sure that nobody forgets. One of the ways that people don't forget is by repeating those stories."

Kwinter offered public accolades in the legislature to the honorees and spoke about the importance of history's lessons.

"We also remember those targeted for their race, disability or sexual orientation," Kwinter said. "Tragically, other genocides followed the Holocaust, such as Cambodia, Rwanda, Bosnia."

He also stressed the significance of liberty and democracy.

"We must continue our spirit of keeping alive the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, approved by the United Nations in the shadow of the Holocaust," Kwinter told a half-full legislature. "We must never take our freedom for granted."

Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman, who represents the most Jewish riding in Ontario, described how his father, a German Jewish refugee, arrived in Canada after fleeing Nazi Germany, coming to Canada by way of England.

"Because in Canada, he was free to be a Jew. In Canada we are all free to practise our religions and live any way we choose."

Shurman also stressed the importance of educating future generations.

Halton MPP Ted Chudleigh said the Holocaust holds many lessons for today. "It revealed the evil capacity of humankind. We must be watchful that this should never happen again. We learned how bystanders shared the responsibility of the Holocaust."

Leo Goldhar, chair, UJA Federation's Joint Campus Management Board.

By Daniel Horowitz

In 2007, UJA Federation's Joint Campus Management Board, a vital new business initiative headed up by chair Leo Goldhar and executive director Gail Bernstein, was born. The board consists of two individual yet intertwined arms: Jewish Community Campuses and Jewish Community Properties.

Jewish Community Campuses oversees the day-to-day operation and integration of five separate structures – all part of UJA Federation's flourishing Tomorrow Campaign – which is building and revitalizing Jewish life on three campuses spread throughout the Greater Toronto Area. These include the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in the downtown district; the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre, Koffler Centre of the Arts, Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage at the Sherman Campus; and York Region's Schwartz/Reisman Centre (SRC) at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus.

Ron Eilath

The second arm of the management board - Jewish Community Properties – headed up by executive director David Sadowski – is responsible for facilities management and the construction of new properties, as well as renovations to existing ones.

"The Joint Campus Management Board will oversee the development, construction, facilities management and operations of approximately one million square feet of community space with an estimated value of four-hundred million dollars," says UJA Federation chief financial officer, Ron Eilath. "The scope of this project has even resulted in the necessity of us creating our own in-house construction company under the knowledgeable guidance of our construction manager, Murray Hamilton. This is a serious, substantial business reorganization, which has attracted some top business professionals who have decided to leave senior executive positions in private industry, to join us and be part of this exciting chapter in Toronto's history."

The directors of all five entities will work together to discover the best and most efficient ways in which the three campuses can interact by creating synergies that will influence content and programming. The Koffler Centre of the Arts, for example, will have artistic and cultural reach beyond its mid-town location, offering cross-campus initiatives that will be accessible to those living in the downtown core or north in Thornhill Woods. The same will apply, for example, with the Schwartz/Reisman Centre which may run various events at the Miles Nadal JCC, or vice versa, so that Jewish populations across the GTA can experience a multitude of programs and services. By integrating the three campuses, shared economies of scale will ensure that there is little, if any, duplication of services being offered, while lowering administrative costs. With greater interaction between the campuses, best practices will be shared and the level of excellence will increase, as in the case of Centre Camp, which will eventually run at all three locations, operating through one central registration system.

David Sadowski

"As chair of the Joint Campus Management Board, I have the opportunity to oversee all of UJA Federation's capital projects and to make a difference in how they're managed," says Goldhar, a Tomorrow Campaign pioneer who, in 1999, along with Lou Greenbaum, helped UJA Federation acquire the land on which the Lebovic Campus now stands. "It's vital that when you're talking about something with the breadth and scope of the Tomorrow Campaign, there is transparency and that it's managed responsibly and professionally. One factor in me taking on this role was having the chance to work with Gail Bernstein. She has the experience and talents necessary to manage all these projects the way they need to be managed."

"When I started here in July of 2007, I was given the mandate of taking five separate organizations and knitting them together," says Bernstein, a Detroit native who bid farewell to a successful 16-year career as CEO and General Manager of Toronto's International Centre, to join UJA Federation. "Because of the top-drawer professionals that I was working with at these organizations, that synergy began surprisingly quickly

square feet of community space and easily. These people are all top-level team players who, despite working as individuals for years, quickly grasped their new roles as part of a team. They started interacting with one another's program managers, executive directors and marketing people – aided greatly by UJA's own creative department – and despite the new methodology involved, it all came together."

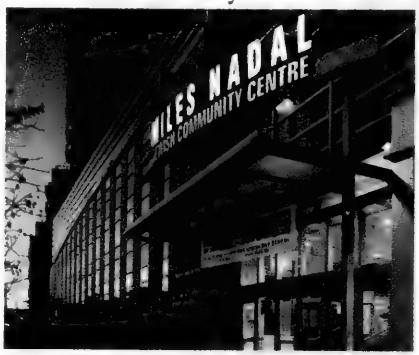
According to Bernstein, another key to the success of UJA's Joint Campus Management Board is Goldhar.

"I am so thrilled to work with Leo; he brings so much to the table," she says. "Leo's real estate acumen and incredible knowledge are invaluable in dealing with both the real estate issues and the business issues. Remember, this is somewhat of a unique situation because while these facilities are community centres, they're also expected to run on a sound, strong business footing and that's where Leo's background really comes into play."

"As valuable as all these key properties and these impressive new buildings are, what's far more important to all of us is what will be happening on those properties and within those buildings," says UJA Federation president & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "This is not just about real estate and construction; it's about celebrating life. We're not interested in running a monolithic, bureaucratic organization; we're interested in the best synergies coming together, creating effective and efficient behind-the-scenes support yet at the same time allowing each campus local autonomy and governance that will enable them to deliver services and programs that best suit the uniqueness of those neighbourhoods."

"I've travelled to many, many Jewish communities across North America and the world, and I'm proud to say that when the Tomorrow Campaign has completed its work, Toronto will stand alone as the world's pre-eminent Jewish community outside of Israel, and I'm thrilled to be part of it all," adds Goldhar.

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre



With close to 4,000 members, the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, located at Bloor and Spadina, has revitalized Toronto's downtown core, transforming a tired, urban corner into a thriving hub of Jewish life. The Centre, a proud model of what the Tomorrow Campaign can accomplish, has also overhauled the way UJA Federation delivers community services and programs. The Miles Nadal JCC has ushered in a new era of independence and accountability for Jewish communities throughout the GTA as, for the first time in our community's history, we have a modern fitness centre that is financially self-sufficient.

Sherman Campus

Slated for completion in the fall of 2011, Sherman Campus will be a dynamic and unprecedented centre of Jewish community services, home to organizations and agencies and an eclectic group of educational, athletic, cultural and recreational activities.

The state-of-the-art new campus will include the Koffler Centre of the Arts; the new Leah Posluns Theatre; the National Centre for Jewish Heritage; the Prosserman JCC, including the Sports Complex & the Gales Family Pavilion; and a renovated and enhanced Lipa Green Building.

The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus

Located in the heart of York Region, in the City of Vaughan – the municipality with the fastest growing Jewish population in North America – the extraordinary 50-acre Lebovic Campus is already surpassing all expectations, quickly changing the landscape of Jewish life north of Steeles Avenue.

The first building on the site, TanenbaumCHAT's Kimel Family Education Centre, opened its doors in time for the school year this past September. With an enrolment of over 650 students already, this state-of-the-art, 110,000 square foot complex – featuring the Meyer/Finkelstein Music Program – is quickly becoming the envy of Jewish students and educators everywhere. Slated to open in 2011 is the magnificent Schwartz/Reisman Centre – a 95,000 square foot facility committed to excellence and to the best of Jewish values – housing the Phil Granovsky Sports & Recreation Pavilion, the Gorman Shore Goodman Early Childhood Education centre and a creative arts centre.

Also calling the Lebovic Campus home in the near future will be a Mount Sinai ambulatory healthcare facility, a state-of-the-art fitness facility that will house up to 8,000 members, a theatre, the Leo & Sala Goldhar Conference & Celebration Centre, two banquet halls, the Sydney & Florence Cooper Family Sports Hall, soccer fields, a baseball diamond, walking paths, the Brown/Lederman Outdoor Pool, a creative arts centre, a nursery school for up to 200 youngsters, seniors facilities, the Reena Community Residence, comprised of 60 units for developmentally challenged community members, United Synagogue Day School/Beit Rayim and Temple Kol Ami.

A cornerstone of the Lebovic Campus will be the modern Community Services Pavilion which will house the organizations and agencies that make up the wide mosaic of vital social, healthcare and other community services that will be offered on the campus including Jewish Family & Child which will be housed in the Levine/Robins Community Services office, Canada-Israel Experience, Jewish Immigrant Aid Service and Reena. Together, these agencies will provide a "one-stop" experience for all those requiring their services.

Warren Kimel and Joseph Lebovic chair the Campus Steering Committee. Lou Greenbaum and Sheldon Goodman chair the Construction Committee.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

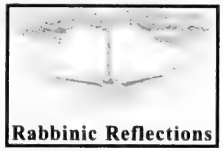
Make giving automatic

By RABBI SCHACHAR ORENSTEIN

Who wants to be a millionaire? It appears that many people do, judging by the huge hit television game show by the same name and David Bach's best-selling personal finance book The Automatic Millionaire, which has sold more than one million copies.



Rabbinic Reflections

Bach's premise can be boiled down to: forget about budgeting. Arrange to have contributions automatically transferred into some kind of savings plan, either through payroll deductions at work or an automatic investment plan run by the bank. Governments and others have been harnessing these tools to take our money, but now we have the ability to use these automatic processes to our advantage, or as he puts it, "to pay ourselves first."

Unexpectedly, Bach has titled the last chapter of his popular book, "Make a Difference with Automatic Tithing," and in doing so, he brings the biblical concept of tithing – ma'aser, giving 10 per cent – into our technological age.

We find a number of forms of tithing in the Bible. The Torah tells us to "take a tithe of all the seed crops that come forth in the field each year" (Dvarim 14:22) to distribute to the poor during the third and sixth years of every sabbatical cycle. We also have another form of tithing, called ma'aser kesafim, financial tithing, based on Jacob saying to God, "Of all that You give me, I will set aside a tenth to You" (Bereshit 28:22).

Rabbi Shimon Taub, in his comprehensive Guide to the Laws of Tzedakah and Maaser, offers a helpful suggestion for following the practice of tithing in our day: "It is advisable that as soon as people earn money, they should immediately separate ma'aser. For instance, people who receive a paycheck should immediately deduct ten percent as ma'aser. One reason is because once the money is designated as ma'aser, funds people no longer consider it as their own, therefore making it easier to give it away... It is expedient to have a special tzedakah account so that the money that is separated as ma'aser can be placed there."

Whether or not to tithe is a very personal decision. There is also a question as to whether Jewish law considers tithing today to be an obligation, chovah, or only a custom, minhag. Either way, Rabbi Yochanan encourages the practice by stating, "What is the meaning of the verse 'Asser ta'asser' (Devarim 14:22)? Separate a tenth so that you will become wealthy!" (Babylonian Talmud, Taanit 9a).

Bach echoes this notion when he writes, sounding perhaps more like a rabbi than a renowned financial planner, "Although you should give simply for the sake of giving, the reality is that abundance tends to flow back to those who give. The more you give, the more comes back to you."

Rather than waiting for a pull at their heartstrings, our agricultural ancestors had many automatic processes of giving to others in addition to tithing. The Torah tells us, "When you reap the harvest of your land, you shall not finish reaping the corner of your field, and you shall not gather the gleanings of your harvest... for the poor and the stranger shall you leave them" (Vayikra 19:9-10). Automatic societal processes during sabbatical and jubilee years also helped provide for the poor. In our times, our ways of giving to those in need, tzedakah, can similarly be done automatically and even in one step.

Though they are not necessarily mutually exclusive goals, I personally give much greater importance and priority to doing the Divine Will than to becoming a millionaire. Since coming across Bach's ideas a few years ago, I have put his automatic giving ideas into practice. I have set up automatic giving to some of my favourite organizations and charities and have been enjoying the automatic monthly mitzvahs ever since.

Israel at 60: take the long view

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Many Jews think more about Israel than about Judaism, because we are 60 years removed from the unthinkable. The great slogan of post-Holocaust Jewry – "never forget" – is like running into the room yelling about the game having started and finding everyone is already glued to the TV. Because the world won't let us forget. Because no matter how many people die elsewhere – in the hundreds, in the thousands – if someone sneezes in the West Bank, that's tomorrow's headline.

JEWISH EDUCATION The Next Generation

So how you think about peace, war, death, underdogs, overlords, Jews, Arabs, "the other"; how you think about force and deterrence and hate and politics and anti-Semitism and Jewish guilt and Jewish entitlement and Jewish mission and Jewish ethics – that's Israel. How you think about salvation and damnation and forgiveness and cruelty and compassion – that's Israel.

I found that in thousands of discussions on ethical issues that I have had with students, eventually some analogy will be threaded back to the Holocaust or Israel.

One day I asked, "Do you think that Israel should strike back at terrorism, even if it means the deaths of many innocent civilians? Is there a limit to the number? Should we destroy their families' houses? Should we make them pay disproportionately? What is disproportional when you fight terror?"

Randy said (all names here are pseudonyms): "We learned about that in the Torah, with Abraham's son, Ishmael. Rashi says that the angels want God to kill him because he is going to be trouble for the Jews later on. But God asks 'Is he a bad guy now?' and the angels say 'No.' So God spares him."

"And is this a good thing?" asked Yoni bitterly. "Ishmael's kids are now suicide bombers."

"But not at the time," said Shauna.

"Oh, so just wait for them to kill you? Not at the time? That's stupid," said Yoni. "Why should I let the bad guys win? Only an idiot waits to get killed."

"Yoni, Yoni!" Shauna almost shouts at her classmate. "If I showed you a man on the street today, an ordinary-looking guy, and I told you that for many years he would live an ordinary life – you know, nothing special – but many years from now, he was going to murder someone, would you kill him now?"

"I don't know," Yoni answered. "Maybe."

He looked like a man who was being tricked out of what he knows to be right. I know how he feels.

Answers to the dilemmas that face the Jewish state at 60 are in fairly short supply.

One can manufacture them in a burst of bravado, but the reality is that the issues are complex and, in some cases, fairly intractable.

I recently heard a telling anecdote about Rabbi Shlomo Aviner, who has been involved in acquiring houses in the Muslim quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem, with the ultimate goal of buying out all the houses.

"How long do you think that will take?" someone asked him skeptically. "A very short amount of time," he replied sincerely. "Maybe 300 years."

In Jewish history, the long run is the correct time frame, that being the closest thing we have to God's calendar.

Author responds to 'New Atheists'

I Don't Believe in Atheists by Chris Hedges; Simon & Schuster.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This outspoken and eloquent book argues that the assertive crop of so-called New Atheists are as mistaken and dangerous as religious fundamentalists.

Chris Hedges has never shrunk from conflict. He spent seven years as Middle East bureau chief for the New York Times, covering the wars in Bosnia and Kosovo. He attacked the American military-industrial complex in his book War Is a Force That Gives Us Meaning and enraged the Christian right with last year's forthright bestseller, American Fascists.

Those who incur the author's wrath include Sam Harris, Richard Dawkins and Christopher Hitchens, who are prominent among those who attack belief in God and religion.

Hedges maintains that the New Atheists mistakenly blame religion for the ills of the world when the true danger lies in the human heart and its capacity for evil.

"Evil will always be with us," he writes. "Science and human reason, like institutional religion, have delivered as much suffering as comfort. The victims of the death camps, those killed at Hiroshima, the tens of millions who died in Soviet gulags, or those millions of innocents maimed and killed in Vietnam, Angola, Sierra Leone, Afghanistan or Iraq and a host of other wars, know the awful truth: "The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, but in ourselves."

The New Atheists are convinced that once we free ourselves from religion we will be able to march forward to a sunlit Utopia. This is the simplistic vision of human advancement shared by all fundamentalists who are incapable of dealing intellectually, and perhaps emotionally, with human contradictions, limitations and ambiguities.

For the author, the question is whether we concern ourselves with – or are utterly indifferent to – the sanctity and ultimate transcendence of human existence. "God is that mysterious force – and you can give it many names as other religions do – which works upon us and through us to seek and achieve truth, beauty and goodness. God is perhaps best understood as our ultimate concern, that in which we should place our highest hopes, confidence and trust.

Hedges is not opposed to anti-religious opinions. Free spirits have been a positive force in opposing bigotry, hypocrisy and foolish and outmoded belief. Often, "the pain of living has also turned honest and compassionate men and women against God," he writes. "These atheists do not believe in collective moral progress or science and reason as our ticket to salvation. They are not trying to perfect the human race. Rather, they cannot reconcile human suffering with the concept of God. This is an honest struggle. This disbelief is a form of despair, not self-exaltation."

For those who rely on scientists and their accomplishments to usher in a new world of understanding and peace, the author warns: "There are scientists in the United States – a huge proportion of whom work for defence-related industries – constructing sophisticated weapons systems that have the capacity to exterminate millions of people. Is this a rational enterprise? Is it beneficial to humankind? Is it a reason for us to place our faith for the future of the human race in reason and science?"

I Don't Believe in Atheists is an intelligent – often passionate – work, aimed at the shortcomings of both religious and secular extremism. Contentious and challenging, it provides added ammunition to a many-sided controversy that shows no signs of abatement.

Back to iTunes U

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

A few months ago, I spent some time at iTunes U, an amazing assortment of audio and video files that can be downloaded free.

ITunes is the free Apple software best known as the program used to download music onto iPods. Recently, a number of universities have begun to take advantage of this technology to distribute recordings of university courses and lectures to their student body and to the general public. Before college lets out for the summer, I wanted to check what's new at iTunes U. I found some great new material, including some public radio documentaries and interviews that would make for entertaining spring and summer listening.

First, a short recap. If you'd like to "attend" iTunes U, first you'll need to download iTunes. It's available for both Macs and PCs – and it's free. [apple.com/itunes/download] Then you can visit the iTunes U section and start browsing through the hundreds of lectures. [tinyurl.com/2ha9ae] Or just check out my recommendations by typing the address into a browser like Internet Explorer, Firefox or Safari. After you hit enter, your iTunes program should automatically open to the correct page. You can listen – and sometimes view – all of these lectures right on your computer and do not need to own an iPod. However, an iPod is handy if you'd like to listen on the go.

You can start by enjoying an interview with Tovah Feldshuh, who in 2004 was appearing on Broadway in the one-woman show Golda's Balcony. Her delightful feature interview includes some lovely anecdotes and excerpts from the play about Israel's fourth prime minister, Golda Meir. Feldshuh does a darn good Kissinger, too! [tinyurl.com/3zyp5s] Feldshuh's is one of almost 200 others from the Downstage Center series of interviews with theatre artists, producers and others in the field. And when you gather a couple of hundred of stage luminaries, you're bound to find a assortment of fascinating Jewish stars, including Joel Grey, Bebe Neuwirth, Liev Schreiber and Eve Ensler. [tinyurl.com/45yx7v]

Since I last visited iTunes U, I was amazed to see all the new Jewish content that had been uploaded. The single largest addition is from the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, which has created a mini-site of incredible audio material that you can download, including:

- 1943: The Jewish World at Ground Zero;
- Auschwitz through the Lens of the SS (a stunning eight-minute video);
- what to do about Darfur, a debate.

There are even multi-part courses on law, music, film, medicine and sports history and the Holocaust. [tinyurl.com/4eyg3a]

I wish they were longer, but you can now download four video clips from the TV documentary series The Jewish Americans. There is a piece about the Detroit Tiger's Hank Greenberg and how he brought pride to a generation of Jewish Americans. Other video excerpts include Tug of War, clips with people wrestling with whether they're Jewish Americans, American Jews – or none of the above; and an all-too-brief interview with author Julius Lester, in the clip the No. 1 Anti-Semite in the Country. [tinyurl.com/4znn2a]

More than half a century after he died, physicist Albert Einstein continues to amaze and mystify. Einstein and the Mind of God is a 12-part radio series that delves "into Einstein's Jewish identity, his passionate engagement around issues of war and race, and… Einstein's way of thinking about mystery, eternity and the mind of God." Download and ponder almost three hours of radio documentaries and interviews about the genius. [tinyurl.com/3q5ya3]

And speaking of Einstein, check out the interviews with Pete Seeger. What's the connection between the father of theory of relativity and the veteran folksinger? Seeger recounts a incredible story about Yiddish novelist Sholem Asch and his son, Moe, who travelled to Princeton in 1939 to record Einstein urging American Jews to help get their brethren out of Europe. Later that day, Einstein chatted with young Moe and encouraged him to pursue his interest in recording American folksingers. Moe Asch went on to found Folkway Records, famous for recording Seeger, Leadbelly and Woody Guthrie. [tinyurl.com/435lon]

Young Israeli musicians make beautiful sounds

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

A joint project of Canadian and Israeli organizations recently brought five young classical musicians to Toronto from Jerusalem.

Music students, aged 11 to 15, from the Jerusalem Academy of Music and Dance, performed here from May 4 to 7. They were accompanied by the director of the conservatory at the academy, conductor Rashi Levaot.

Their first performance in Canada was at Stephen Lewis Secondary School, in Vaughan, Ont., to about 200 public school children.

Later that day, they performed for adults at the Unicorn Dream Dinner, a fundraiser for the Max and Beatrice Wolfe Centre for Children's Grief and Palliative Care at Mount Sinai Hospital. The dinner's focus was to highlight the achievements of Israeli arts and culture.

The students also played live on Toronto's Classical 96.3 radio.

The dean of the Glenn Gould Professional School in Toronto, pianist James Anagnoson, gave the students a tour of the soon-to-be-completed TELUS Centre for music education and performance.

The Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and the consulates of Israel in Toronto and Miami, to celebrate Israel @ 60, sponsored the students' trip.

Adrienne Cohen, the chair of the Jerusalem Academy Student Tour of Toronto, said that the visit was part of the Israeli Foreign Ministry's "Brand Israel" program, to improve Israel's image and to get people to think of the country outside the narrow prism of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

For most of the young musicians, this was their first trip to Canada, and it was yet another chance to showcase their talents.

Violinist Daniel Asharov, 15, has been studying the violin from the age of six. He won the Sharett Competition for solo performance four times in the past seven years and has performed in concerts in New York in 2006 and in Capetown in 2007 with the Johannesburg Philharmonic Orchestra.

Saxophonist Ron Agron, 16, started his music studies at the age of 12, and in his short career, he has already won acclaim in Israel. In 2007, he won the outstanding musician award from the America-Israel Cultural Foundation. He has been a soloist with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra.

Fourteen-year-old pianist Itai Meyer has been studying at the Jerusalem Conservatory of Music and Dance since the age of nine. He is modest about his musical talent. "There's no difference between people," he said. "Everyone can be successful at things if they try."

Siblings pianist Michael Cohen-Weissert, 15, and cellist Elia Cohen-Weissert, 14, grew up on the Greek island of Sifnos, where they began their musical studies.

Michael has received the America-Israel Cultural Foundation Piano and Chamber Music Scholarship, the youngest composer ever to receive the scholarship. At the age of 12, Michael won the first prize in the National Broadcasting Authority Competition for young artists, performing with the Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra.

Elia has also received the America-Israel Cultural Foundation scholarship, both as a solo artist and as a chamber musician. At age 12, she performed with the Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra.

She admitted that she was initially anxious about her debut to North American peers. "It was scary to perform," she said.

She adds that she wanted to play cello from a very early age. "I chose this, and I want to be a soloist."

Music, runs in the family: her mother, from Germany, is a pianist, and her father, originally from Romania, is a professional guitarist.

"It's beautiful that we came, and I hope that they [the audience] finds the music beautiful. I hope they will enjoy listening to classical music," Elia said.

Gaur Bhupesh, 15, a student at Stephen Lewis, was impressed. "It was a really good performance. Amazing," he said.

Bhupesh doesn't speak any Hebrew but found a shared language with the Israeli students. "We are all the same with our own unique skills," he said. "Students are students wherever you go."

Ilan Ramon and the three Torahs

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Two Torahs have been in outer space – one carried by an Israeli, the other by a Canadian. Both had been saved by Holocaust survivors, and at a recent ceremony at Beth Tikvah Synagogue to commemorate Yom Hashoah, they were linked to a third Torah now being written to honour the congregation's Rabbi Wayne Allen.

A film made by Israel's Channel One called The First Israeli in Space: The Story of Colonel Ilan Ramon, Israel's First Astronaut was shown at the event. In January 2003, Ramon was a crew member of the space shuttle Columbia, which exploded on re-entry to Earth, minutes before its scheduled landing.

Ramon had brought a Torah, about four inches long, with him into space. It was thought to be about 100 years old, and had been smuggled into the Bergen-Belsen death camp. The Torah was used by Rabbi Dasberg of Holland to give secret bar mitzvah lessons to 13-year-old Joachim "Yoya" Joseph.

Rabbi Dasberg gave the Torah to the Joseph, knowing the boy's chances of survival were greater than his own. Joseph survived, made aliyah, and ultimately became an astrophysicist at Tel Aviv University. He later became a mentor to Ramon, himself the son of a Holocaust survivor. Ramon asked if he could bring the Torah with him into space, in part as a symbol of the Jewish people's ability to survive.

The second Torah that was carried into space belongs to Henry Fenichel, a physicist from Cincinnati, also a Holocaust survivor. His miniature Torah – a gift from cousins who had escaped Nazi Germany – took off into space three years after Ramon's flight. Fenichel explained at last week's event how he and his Torah became involved with space travel.

In 1944, Fenichel was deported from Holland to Bergen-Belsen, where he was held for six months until he was freed in a prisoner exchange for German civilians living in Palestine. Fenichel, only six at the time, lost his father in Auschwitz, and when leaving the camp, travelled with his mother for 10 gruelling days by train to Palestine.

"There are so many amazing stories to tell," he told the audience of 300, "and I would like people to connect to their past, their heritage, and know the symbolism of these Torahs and what they represent."

Henry Fenichel and the Torah

Rona Ramon, Ilan's widow, and Joachim Joseph first learned of Fenichel's Torah in April 2006 in a joint video conference from Israel for schoolchildren in Cincinnati. Fenichel spoke to the 150 schoolchildren in the U.S. city, where he expressed his desire to teach of the legacy of Yoya's Torah.

After learning of the Torah that was similar to the one Ramon had taken on the Columbia, Rona Ramon asked Fenichel to allow his scroll to be carried by Canadian astronaut Steve MacLean on the shuttle Atlantis in September 2006, as a tribute to her husband.

MacLean, who had been friends with Ilan Ramon, spoke in a video message at the recent Yom Hashoah commemoration. The mini-Torah is "more than a religious symbol," he said. "It is a symbol of hope. It was a privilege for me to do that."

Fenichel's Torah took some 186 trips around the Earth in the shuttle, travelling about 4.8 million miles, MacLean said, going from what he described as "the depths of despair to the heights of hope."

MacLean also recalled some private time he had with the Ramon family, in the eastern part of Texas before Ilan's fatal journey. "He told me when he came back from space, he would work toward Middle East peace," Maclean said.

In addition to the tribute to Ramon at Beth Tikvah, a ceremony was held for a new Torah being written to honour Rabbi Wayne Allen's 21st anniversary with the congregation.

The new Torah's writing began on Dec. 2, 2007. It is expected to be completed on Nov. 23 this year. Some 175 families have thus far bought letters, words or lines, said Heather Shapero, the event organizer.

Harper, who has yet to visit Israel, said his determination to make the "pilgrimage" to Israel was redoubled after a recent visit to Auschwitz.

"I want to see first-hand what the survivors of the Holocaust and their descendants have accomplished. Theirs is truly an achievement of resilience and renewal unsurpassed by anyone," he said.

"As we gather tonight to celebrate 60 years of the state of Israel, let us all as Canadians, do whatever we can do, to help Israelis and their neighbours in their quest for a better future."

Before Harper's speech, MC Ivan Reitman, the Toronto-raised director of blockbuster Hollywood films, including Ghostbusters and Twins, told the audience – his "extended mishpachah"– that he learned about the importance of Israel from his parents, who were Holocaust survivors.

"Isn't it wonderful to be able to celebrate the miracle of Israel's 60th birthday, the incredible resolve and determination of the people of Israel? [Israelis] have created a vibrant and democratic nation despite unrelenting challenges. Regardless of where we live in the Diaspora, we can always call Israel home," Reitman said.

The Yom Ha'atzmaut event, co-chaired by Fred Waks and Sara Zagdanski, and organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, included performances by the Combined Jewish Day Schools Choir, the Renanim Youth Singers with Kol Neshama, the Israel Defense Forces Ensemble, Israeli ballet dancers, and the Israeli hip-hop band Hadag Nachash.

The sold-out crowd waved Canadian and Israeli flags, sang along with the performers and even broke into a horah.

Israeli President Shimon Peres, who addressed the gathering via a recorded video message, praised the state's accomplishments in agriculture, medicine and security.

"We have the right to be proud, but we don't have the permission to be satisfied," Peres said.

Israel consul general Amir Gissin, who was spending his first Yom Ha'atzmaut in Toronto, said he was at a loss for words.

"Driving today up Bathurst Street, half the cars have Israeli flags. You have made Toronto the closest place to Israel tonight."

UJA allocates $20,000 for Burma

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has allocated $20,000 (US) to fund IsraAID's mission to Burma in the wake of the May 3 cyclone there.

Federation is also accepting donations at jewishtoronto.net.

Current reports have estimated that upward of 100,000 people may have died from the effects of Tropical Cyclone Nagris, which has also left hundreds of thousands homeless.

The money will go toward a team of 10 medical personnel and water specialists to be deployed to Burma. IsraAID is a co-ordinating body of Israeli and Jewish NGOs in Israel that are active in development and relief work and has provided humanitarian aid worldwide.

Federation has previously supported IsraAID'S work after the Peru earthquake; work on the border of Darfur; relief aid following the earthquake in Pakistan; relief aid to hurricane Katrina evacuees in New Orleans and aid to Somali camps in Kenya.

In addition, both the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and B'nai B'rith International have opened disaster relief funds to send aid to the Southeast Asian country.

The JDC's international development program, which responds to natural and man-made disasters with immediate relief and long-term assistance, collects funds on a non-sectarian basis. The JDC is helping some of the region's estimated 10 Jews.

B'nai B'rith will allocate $10,000 to help IsraAID send its team.

Donations to the JDC can be made at www.jdc.org or by phone at 212-687-6200.

Donations to B'nai B'rith can be made online at www.bnaibrith.org/support/disaster_relief.cfm.

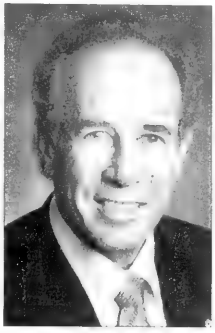
Four Seasons CEO to be honoured by Hebrew U

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Friends of Hebrew University is getting set to honour Canadian businessman and philanthropist Isadore Sharp with a tribute dinner next week.

Sharp, chairman and CEO of the Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts, will be honoured May 22 by the Toronto chapter of CFHU because of his endowment of the Isadore Sharp Einstein Doctoral Scholarship at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.



Isadore Sharp

The endowment will go toward financial support for top doctoral students from a variety of faculties.

"These are the most elite scholarships because they are for doctoral students and the crème de la crème of the university. Really, in essence, what they are trying to do is ensure that the top academics in Israel stay in Israel and don't go elsewhere," said Lissie Sanders, CFHU's project manager.

Sanders said CFHU is expecting more than 800 people to attend the dinner, which is being held at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel. The event is nearly sold out, and CFHU is very close to reaching its goal of raising $4 million.

"It is an evening celebrating Isadore Sharp and his commitment to the university," Sanders said, adding that guests will be treated to a special musical guest, Miri Ben Ari, an Israeli-born and New York-based hip hop violinist who has performed with artists such as Kanye West and John Legend.

Sanders said that Sharp himself will say a few words about his commitment to the university, to academia and to Israel, while his family with honour him with a video presentation.

"He also has a cousin coming who is going to be speaking a little bit, who is a mathematician who studied Einstein's theory of relativity with some of Einstein's protégés," she said.

Sharp, the son of Polish immigrants, is a self-made man who, according to Canadian Business Magazine, is one of Canada's 100 richest men.

He graduated from what is now Ryerson University in 1952 with a degree in architecture, and nine years later, he opened the first Four Seasons hotel in downtown Toronto.

Since then, one hotel has grown into 75 in 31 countries, and more are in the development stage.

Through the years, Sharp and his wife, Rosalie, have made contributions to both Canadian and Israeli institutions and projects, such as Toronto's Four Seasons Centre for the Performing Arts, the Ontario College of Art and Design, Mount Sinai Hospital, and, of course, Hebrew U.

Sharp is also the director of the national Terry Fox Run, which he initiated in 1982, four years after he tragically lost one of his four sons to cancer.

"He's an interesting fellow, because most people know who he is because of his business reputation, but few people know really who he is, because he's not really out there like some other people," Sanders said.

"He is extremely accessible, he is very kind… and very warm."

Queen's prof remakes Jewish studies program

By JORDAN PRESS
Special to The CJN

KINGSTON — It has been an interesting year for Howard Tzvi Adelman.

The chair of the Jewish studies program at Queen's University in Kingston came to the school at the start of the 2007-08 academic year with an idea of where he wanted to take the program.

Instead of having the program be academically isolated, in a sense, from the rest of the university, Adelman decided to weave Jewish studies into the fabric of other departments and programs.

"One of the main things I was trying to do is create a stronger relationship with other academic departments," he said.

It worked.

So while students entering Queen's next year will still be able to enrol in Jewish studies, they will also be able to learn about the tenets of Judaism and the history of the Jewish people in other liberal arts courses at the 167-year-old post-secondary institution.

Jewish studies won't just be for those enrolled in the program anymore.

Adelman said there have already been expressions of interest from students in other academic disciplines interested in taking Jewish studies as a minor for their degree.

Howard Adelman

And as for the Jewish studies program, Adelman said, "I see future growth."

Adelman has taught Jewish studies in the United States and Israel. He was educated in the United States and received two degrees in Jewish studies, a bachelor's degree from Cornell University and a master's degree from the Jewish Theological Seminary. He also holds a PhD from Brandeis University.

He joined Queen's in 2007, took over as chair of the department, and came in with a road map for where he wanted to go.

"My expectations, having been in the field for a while, were realistic," he said. "I knew what was needed."

But rather than giving students across the university a superficial sense of Judaism, Adelman and the department decided to give students a deeper sense of the texts and tenets that are the base of Jewish studies and integrate them into other disciplines.

Jewish studies has become embedded in other courses and departments such as philosophy and history.

So while studying the great philosophers, students also get the chance to study the philosophical basics of Judaism.

It took a year of academic and university reviews to approve all the changes, but, Adelman said, it all took place on time and on schedule.

"It's done," he said.

Adelman said he hopes more non-Jewish studies students will enrol in courses about Judaism and Jewish thought.

Next year, the department will still offer some seminars or "open subject courses" for Jewish studies students, Adelman said, but there won't be any specific Jewish studies courses.

For more information about the program, visit www.queensu.ca/jewishstudies.

Centenarian is a Drildzer stalwart

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

At age 100, Jack Stopper, who is known as Mr. Drildz, is a delight to talk to.

He has a remarkable recall of a century of history, as well as a keen sense of humour, despite some hearing difficulties.

He was interviewed at his home and workshop in Thornhill, where he has lived with his daughter, Rochelle Sufrin, for the past four years. He walks without a cane or a walker, and is able to climb several flights of steps.

Over a cup of tea, he was toasted with, "To 120," to which he replied, "I still have 20 years to live."

Stopper earned the nickname "Mr. Drildz" for his more than 70 years of leadership of the Drildzer Congregation and Society, formerly the Drildzer Young Men's Mutual Benefit Society.

Born in Chesterchov, Poland, on February 25, 1908, Stopper said his family moved to Drildz when he was a young child. He said he had a happy childhood, and later worked for his father, who operated a successful hat manufacturing business.

When Stopper was 22 years old, his father told him to leave Poland for Canada, as his aunt, who lived in Toronto, needed his help.

He couldn't understand why his father was sending him away, but after he arrived in Toronto in 1930, he found out that his parents didn't like the family of the girl he was seeing, "because they didn't have enough yichos [status]."

In Toronto, Stopper went to work in a hat and cap business, and later he owned and operated the Imperial Hat and Cap Company. In the basement of his home, he still has a cutting table, steaming blocks and antiquated sewing machines, and he still takes some limited orders for hats and caps.

But the passion of his life has been the Drildzer, which was formed in 1924. Four years after he arrived in Canada, in 1934 at age 26, a senior member of the organization, Chemele Bleeman, asked him to organize a young men's group, noting that most of the group's members were old, in their 70s and 80s.

"I didn't understand why they asked me, because I was the last person in the group to come to Canada as the immigration from Poland was closed down," he said.

He recalls that there were about 10 men in the organization. "In those days, we didn't count the women as members." He recalled that the women sat upstairs, and there was a hole in the floor to look downstairs where the men davened.

The membership began to grow, and over the years, the Drildzers moved several times, from Huron and Baldwin streets, then to Markham and Ulster streets, and with the help of Louis Shields, who was not a Drildzer but generously supported the organization, the group purchased its present location on Wilson Avenue just west of Bathurst Street.

"Everyone had moved up north, so we had to move," Stopper explained.

Through the years, Stopper has served as president and as a senior officer.

He said there have been many changes over the years. "Now women are full members and are active on the executive.

"We only hold holiday and Sunday morning services, which are followed by a wonderful breakfast with a family feeling. Before, it would take nine months to plan a banquet with everyone having an opinion. Now we have committees and everything goes smoothly."

He loves to spend time with his family, his two daughters, Sufrin and Ruth Greenberg, as well as five grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren.

Stopper still does things that would be amazing even for someone a quarter-century younger than he is.

"My father is still very active," Sufrin said. "He goes shopping with me and at the cottage, he rakes leaves and he uses a chainsaw to cut up the wood."

Oakwood CI marks 100 years

After three years in the planning, Oakwood Collegiate Institute's (OCI) 100th anniversary celebration was a resounding success.

From April 30 to May 4, hundreds of former and current OCI students came out to celebrate, with some alumni travelling great distances to meet and mingle with friends and former classmates, some of whom they had not seen for more than 30 years.

The weekend activities included a music night at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, where alumni and present-day students performed for an enthusiastic, full-to-capacity audience of 1,000.

There was a gala dinner and dance, a golf day, a pub night at the school, located on St. Clair Avenue at Oakwood Avenue, the opening of an archives room and the rededication of a war memorial.

"It was a lot of work, but it was also a lot of fun," said Charles Marmoreo (class of 1958), who is in structural steel drafting. "And we had a great deal of co-operation from many people."

Marmoreo, president of OCI's alumni association and John Iaboni (1970), a sportswriter for the Toronto Sun, co-chaired the 100th anniversary event.

Marmoreo spoke of his recollections of his years at Oakwood. He said that in the 1940s and 50s, many of the classes had a majority of Jewish students.

"Whenever Passover and other holidays came around, we went down to about two students in the class," he said.

Alumnus Louise (Rappaport) Starkman (1959) said alumni and current Oakwood students worked together and did a "phenomenal job" on the reunion, particularly in assembling class photos and memorabilia and setting up decade rooms.

She noted that the oldest graduate to attend was 97 years old "and he still participates in many activities."

She added: "The gala was spectacular and at the pub night, it was fun meeting former students as well as teachers, and sharing memories."

Over the years, the student mix at Oakwood has changed to include many people of Italian descent, and today it has a very ethnically mixed student population.

Starkman spoke of the outstanding teachers past and present in the departments of sciences, arts and sports. "The Oakwood teachers influenced whole generations of students."

Bruce Snell, a former music teacher attended the reunion. Starkman noted that former students such as Dr. Michael Baker, a professor and physician-in-chief at the University Health Network, played in the school's orchestra and continues to play music.

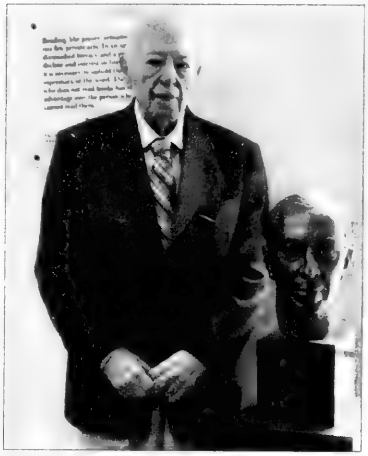
Baker said he is proud that his children, Jeffrey and Jennifer, attended Oakwood and were also scholarship winners.

There are many Jews among OCI's long list of outstanding graduates, Starkman said, including Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Silverman Abella; Dr. Gerald Baker, professor and head of oral surgery at Mount Sinai Hospital; Dr. Alan Bernstein, the director of the Global Effort to Coordinate HIV Vaccine Development for the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation; former provincial and federal cabinet minister Elinor Caplan; music producer Bob Ezrin; Murray Koffler, founder of Shoppers Drug Mart; filmmaker Ivan Reitman, and Judge Sidney Robbins. — C.G.

Rabbi Baskin marks 60 years in the rabbinate

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Rabbi Bernard Baskin was Temple Anshe Sholom's longest serving rabbi, officiating at the Reform temple for 40 years. He holds the record in Hamilton's history for the longest tenure at one congregation. In 1989, he was appointed rabbi emeritus of Temple Anshe Sholom.



Rabbi Bernard Baskin stands beside a bust of himself that was created by sculptor Elizabeth Holbrook, in 1969.

A gala dinner, to be held at the Hamilton Convention Centre on May 22, will celebrate Rabbi Baskin's 60th year in the rabbinate. The event is a fundraiser for Temple Anshe Sholom.

A ticket for the gala includes a first-edition copy of The Essential Bernard Baskin: Our Beloved Rabbi, a collection of Rabbi Baskin's columns written over the last half century for the Hamilton Spectator.

Rabbi Baskin was born in New Jersey in 1920. He graduated from Brooklyn College in 1942 and from the Jewish Institute of Religion with a master's degree in Hebrew literature. Before his ordination in 1947, he served as an interim war-time rabbi in Denver. He was ordained in 1948, the same week that Israel declared its independence. He briefly worked in Baton Rouge, La. In 1949, Rabbi Baskin and his wife, Marjorie, moved to Hamilton, Ont., and never left.

When Rabbi Baskin arrived in 1949, Temple Anshe Sholom had a congregation of about 90 families. Under Baskin, the number rose to close to 450 families. "Both the Reform and Conservative groups benefited from the postwar change in Jewish attitudes," he says.

The first- and second-generation Jews living in Hamilton during the war were eastern European, traditional, and didn't feel an affinity for Reform Judaism. However, their children and the third generation of Jews living in Hamilton, Rabbi Baskin says, had more formal education and were looking for new possibilities, and became interested in a liberal approach to Judaism.

During Rabbi Baskin's tenure, a new synagogue was erected in west Hamilton to replace the former small building that had become inadequate. This contributed to the growth of the congregation.

Hamilton began to feel like home to Rabbi Baskin and Marjorie. Their three children, Judith, David and Susan, were born here.

When Rabbi Baskin became rabbi emeritus of Anshe Sholom, he and Marjorie, who died in 2005, went into the antiquarian book business. The books were mostly Judaica. "We did this for close to 20 years, which was fun and a source of interest," Rabbi Baskin says. "At one time or another, I had close to 10,000 books."

After his retirement, he also served in a part-time capacity at Temple Am Sholom in Barrie, Ont.

Over the years, Rabbi Baskin has been honoured by numerous Jewish and non-Jewish organizations, including B'nai Brith, Jewish National Fund, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, Hebrew Union College and McMaster University.

The rabbi was also chosen as Hamilton's Big Brother of the year and received the Rotary Club's Paul Harris Fellow Award for achievement in public relations. In 1990, the city of Hamilton bestowed upon him its highest honour when it named him to its Gallery of Distinction.

From his early days in Hamilton, Rabbi Baskin was involved with interfaith activities and has spoken to many non-Jewish groups.

For more than 50 years, Rabbi Baskin has presented lectures on literature at McMaster University and the Hamilton Public Library. His annual Books and Ideas lecture series at Temple Anshe Sholom is very popular.

Rabbi Baskin says he has seen many changes in Reform Judaism over the years, including a significant increase in the number of Reform Jews, among them many women. He says this is partly due to women becoming better educated over the years. There have been women rabbis and presidents in the Reform movement for more than 30 years, he notes

Another change Rabbi Baskin has observed is that the Reform movement has become more traditional. Nowadays, there is more Hebrew in the service and most people cover their heads and have bar or bat mitzvahs, he says.

He adds that Reform Judaism has become more Zionist and he also sees greater involvement of Reform Jews in the general community.

Kingston high schoolers create Shoah museum

By JORDAN PRESS
Special to The CJN

KINGSTON — Students in Pam Simon's literacy class at Queen Elizabeth Collegiate in Kingston have been doing a lot of work on the Holocaust lately.

They have interviewed survivors living in the city, and by the end of June, they will know where those testimonies will be housed.

The Limestone District School Board provided the students, aged 15 to 17, with a grant to establish a permanent museum and memorial to the dozen or so Holocaust survivors living in Kingston and the millions more who died in World War II.

Initially the museum will be housed in the school, but eventually, the hope is to move it to its own location somewhere in Kingston, Simon said.

"Our students are very proud of their contributions," said Simon, who will visit the sites of former concentration camps in Poland this summer.

"These kids have received little positive feedback in their lives, so the time they have spent with the survivors and their hours of dedication to this project are very important to them," she added.

"The students would love to go with me to Poland and Israel this summer. I wish we had funding for them."

Simon's interest in the Holocaust started a few years ago, when she wrote a play about Jewish speed dating. She decided to make one of the characters a Holocaust survivor, but without any personal connection to the genocide, she wasn't sure what to do with the character.

Like any good writer, she did some research and interviewed survivors.

The work piqued her interest enough that last year Simon decided to incorporate the Holocaust into her literacy course at Queen Elizabeth Collegiate, located in central Kingston.

Survivors interviewed for documentary

One of the books she chose for the class was Hana's Suitcase, the story of Hana and George Brady, two Jewish children from Czechoslovakia and the schoolchildren in present-day Japan who researched what became of the Brady siblings.

The Queen Elizabeth students were hooked. They wanted to know more about the Holocaust and started to visit websites and read books on the subject. They created an information package on the Holocaust for local schools and public libraries. They also decorated the back wall of Simon's classroom and made it into a small memorial to Holocaust victims.

But the students wanted to do more, Simon said.

"We decided that we needed to do something important for the survivors in our city," she said. "Hence, the birth of a documentary and a museum that would serve as both an educational centre and exhibit space."

They are close to being finished. They have interviewed survivors living in Kingston and spoken with children of survivors. Some of the testimonies will be used as part of a 30-minute documentary that will be shown in the museum, once it's established. Copies will also be kept at the Beth Israel Synagogue in Kingston.

The students hope to open the museum and present the film to the public at a gala event in the fall.

It will mark a milestone for both the students and their teacher, Simon said.

"My students will be able to say that they contributed something important during their lifetimes. As their teacher, I was able to guide them toward a greater purpose and hopefully inspire them to continue their involvement in humanitarian causes."

Some members of the community have also gotten behind the project by making donations to it. Simon said the class is still looking for donations to go along with the grant from the school board.

ועל זה כתב המשורר יהודה עמיחי, כשחגר שבור ופצוע ממלחמת העצמאות:

"מחצית האנשים בעולם
אוהבים את המחצית השניה,
מחצית האנשים בעולם
שונאים את השניה,
האם בגלל אֵלה ואֵלה אֲנַי
ללכת ולנדוד
ולהשתנות בלי הרף..."

Cabbie fights taxi ban on mezuzot

MONTREAL — A taxi driver is seeking $5,000 from the city of Montreal because he opposes a bylaw that prohibits him from displaying personal mementos in his car.

Arieh Perecowicz says the Montreal Taxi Bureau rule is "discriminatory" and violates his freedom of expression guaranteed by the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. He earlier filed a complaint with the Quebec Human Right Commission.

Perecowicz, who has driven a cab for 42 years, has been fined a total of $764 since December 2006 for having a picture of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Schneerson, two mezuzot, family photos, a Remembrance Day poppy and a Canadian flag in his taxi.

He is also asking Montreal Municipal Court to delay ruling on the four fines he is contesting until the Human Rights Commission looks at his complaint.

The bylaw, adopted in 2003, prohibits any "object or inscription that is not required for the taxi to be in service."

In his complaint to the Human Rights Commission, he says: "The objects in my vehicle do not in any way diminish the rights of any passenger and do not interfere with the proper operation of my taxi."

Last fall, Perecowicz expressed his concerns that his rights were being infringed upon before the Bouchard-Taylor commission on the reasonable accommodation of religious minorities, when the hearings were held in St. Hyacinthe.

Israeli ambassador's comments come under fire

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker stirred the wrath of critics last week over remarks suggesting Canada's growing Muslim population might in future shift the country's foreign policy away from Israel.

His comments came as Prime Minister Stephen Harper delivered a strongly worded address in support of Israel during its 60th anniversary celebrations.

Alan Baker

Ambassador Baker told the Globe and Mail that Muslim communities had influenced foreign policy in European countries such as France. "The question is, how do you treat the results of this fact? Do you expect from these greater numbers that they will absorb themselves into Canadian society as Canadians or that they'll try to push Canadians to adopt their own values and principles? And this is the gist of the problem."

He also criticized a Muslim Toronto-area Liberal MP, Omar Alghabra, for "hostility toward Israel," later amending his description of Alghabra to "less than friendly."

And he pointed to the disruptions of pro-Israel speakers on university campuses.

Khaled Mouammar, national president of the Canadian Arab Federation, said Baker was fostering "bigotry." He demanded a public apology and said "since being posted to Canada, Mr. Baker has been treating Canada as a colony of Israel and acting as extraordinary and plenipotentiary ambassador."

He called on the government to "rebuke" the ambassador.

Alghabra said Baker's comments were "shocking and inappropriate," as well as divisive.

Liberal foreign affairs critic, MP Bob Rae, said, "Ambassador Baker should reflect on his comments because I don't think they were either accurate or constructive."

Canada counts itself among Israel's best friends: Bernier

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Canada's support for Israel is strong and unequivocal, said Minister of Foreign Affairs Maxime Bernier at a celebration of Israel's 60th birthday.

Bernier was speaking at a reception hosted by Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker for members of the diplomatic corps and representatives of Jewish community organizations.

Describing his recent trip to Israel, Bernier said that an aerial survey of the country gave him "an opportunity to better understand the security challenges that you are facing."

He added: "Canada and Israel share the same values – freedom, democracy, human rights and the rule of law. This is why we are proud to stand with Israel… and we are proud to count ourselves among Israel's best friends."

The reception was held May 7 at the National Gallery of Canada, which, as Baker noted, was designed by world-renowned architect Moshe Safdie, an Israeli Canadian.

Outside the building, protesters held signs in a silent vigil to commemorate what Palestinians refer to as the "Nakba" (catastrophe). Pamphlets were distributed to passersby, outlining why Israel's 60th birthday is not a cause of celebration for Palestinians.

Inside the building, the atmosphere was festive and celebratory. This reporter encountered a Lebanese Christian friend who had come to the celebration with Jewish friends.

Chaired by Penny Torontow, the event attracted hundreds of people who enjoyed an array of Israeli foods, took part in various children's activities and gambled at the "Dizengoff Casino."

"We want everyone from kids to grandparents to experience first-hand the energy and jostling of being on a crowded street or park on Yom Ha'atzmaut. When you enter the hall, you will see circus acts, balloon art and jugglers, hear the sounds of Israeli music and smell the food being prepared at kiosks, just as you would walking around Israel on Yom Ha'atzmaut," Torontow said in her program message.

The official part of the event was opened by a colour guard (flag spinning) by the Ottawa War Veterans, who were followed by a procession of children from various Jewish schools. After the singing of the national anthems of Canada and Israel, and messages from Baker and event chair Torontow, everyone was invited to wander around and enjoy the event.

The InJoy Orchestra, led by Gilat Rapaport, performed traditional and contemporary music, bringing many to the dance floor for Israeli dancing.

A number of other events are planned in the coming weeks in celebration of Israel's 60th birthday, including a gala reception and concert by the Ottawa Symphony Orchestra May 20.

Yom Hazikaron / Yom Ha'atzmaut

Fallen soldiers commemorated

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

An estimated 1,000 people gathered at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue on May 6, the eve of Yom Hazikaron, for the Israeli consulate's annual Memorial Day ceremony for Israel's fallen soldiers.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general of Israel in Toronto, said in a Hebrew-language address that tens of thousands of Israelis would wake up in Israel the next day to travel to military cemeteries.

In his own immediate family, he said, his mother would drive to the Negev to visit the grave of her brother, who was killed in Israel's War of Independence, while Gissin's brother would head to Rishon Lezion to visit a cousin's grave.

But no one in the family would be able to get to Zichron Ya'akov, where another cousin, Ehud Efrati, was buried late last year after being killed on reserve duty.

For Israeli families, grief is very personal, but it's also collective, as it was at the memorial ceremony, Gissin told The CJN the next day.

He told the mostly Hebrew-speaking audience at the service that their answer to those who question Israel's right to exist is to be "better in the sense that we should be worthy of the unbelievable personal price that the Israeli fallen soldiers have paid" and to ensure that the State of Israel continues to develop.

Beth David's Rabbi Philip Scheim spoke of Mati Sukenik, who died in Israel's War of Independence.

In Nov. 1947, Sukenik heard on the radio that the United Nations had just voted in favour of partitioning Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab State, the rabbi said.

He went to his father, archeologist Eliezer Sukenik, to tell him the news, just as the elder Sukenik was working on a particular section of the Dead Sea Scrolls that he would later name the Scroll of Thanksgiving.

"In this 60th anniversary year," said Rabbi Scheim, "we have... re-entered the land of Israel on the shoulders of our ancestors who refused to relinquish an ancient dream, and on the shoulders of the brave men and women, young and old, whose bravery, whose sacrifice gave a long-struggling nation renewed reason to hope, and even to celebrate."

The event, MCed by Shelly Levy and Robert Sarner, also included readings in Hebrew and English, prayers, music, and the laying of a wreath by youth movement members. Capt. (Res.) Yaron Ashkenazi read a message from Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi (no relation).

Ceremony remembers dead on eve of Israel's 60th

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — On the eve of Israel's milestone 60th birthday last week, hundreds from the community honoured the memory of the 23,000 Israeli men, women and children who were "plucked from life by war and terror."

That was the phrase used by educator Shimshon Hamerman, who, along with Betty Elkaim, was the master of ceremonies at the annual hour-long Yom Hazikaron ceremony remembering the soldiers and citizens who paid the ultimate price so the Jewish state could live.

At the outdoor commemoration in front of 1 Cummings Square, students bearing Israel's colours stood atop the steps of the Segal Centre for Performing Arts at The Saidye, Machal war veterans Ralph Charad and Sydney Cadloff lowered the Israeli flag, and those in attendance observed a moment of silence.

"Remembrance means never to forget," noted Hamerman, adding that it works two ways: prospective memory, such as in the biblical exhortation to think about Shabbat every day, and retrospective memory, as in the duty to remember the past.

Those killed were "innocent souls who sacrificed their lives so that each and every Jew should have a place called home," Hamerman said.

Israel's consul general, Yoram Elron, said the birth and survival of Israel "could never have happened had it not been for their sacrifice." Israel's best and brightest were lost, he said, and that loss is contemplated in silent sorrow by Jews everywhere. "Let them continue to be an inspiration to us all."

FEDERATION CJA president Marc Gold noted that the solemn interlude of Yom Hazikaron took place between the mournfulness of Yom Hashoah and joy of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel Independence Day.

The thousands dead "remind us of what a tremendous loss of life and potential" the last six decades have wrought, he said.

The ceremony was also marked by the participation of a number of relatives of Israeli soldiers killed in action and by terrorists.

Effy Givon, whose brother Etty Givon died in combat in 1970, lit the memorial candle, while Kaddish was recited by Safir Schnaiderman, whose father, Alexander, died in 1985 when a suicide bomber detonated next to his army vehicle.

Hamerman later said to remember the "soldiers, volunteers, civilians, and our brother and sisters" who sacrificed their lives. Let us also remember, he said, "the resistance heroes, Canadian Machal volunteers, Montrealers who fought in Israel, and members of security forces and terror victims."

During another portion of the ceremony, six relatives of fallen soldiers and victims of terror, accompanied by students or community leaders, laid wreaths: Hana Dror, for her father, Menachem Shimshon Frenkel, killed in 1948; Daliah Gladstone, for her husband, Moshe Aharonov, killed in 1967; Mordechai Lugassi, for his brother Tziona, killed in 1975; Montrealer David Friedberg, for his brother Yehoshua Friedberg, killed in 1993; Moishe Cohen, for his grandfather Yaniv Bar-On, killed in 2006; Isaac Dahan for his brother Gabriel, killed in 1956; and Avi Sulimani of Sderot, for his brother Yacov, killed in 1973.

The ceremony was also interspersed with student readings, song performances by the visiting Tzerie choir of Be'er Sheva and Meitarim choir of Sderot, and the recitation of Psalm 21 and the K'El Maleh Rachamim.

Earlier in the day, 26 Jewish school students presented Elron and relatives of the six soldiers honoured at the commemoration, with documentaries about them.

OU head pleads for Jewish unity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb delivered a pointed message about Jewish unity to a sanctuary full of people gathered for Mizrachi Canada's annual Yom Hazikaron/Yom Ha'atzmaut program last week at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation in Thornhill.

The executive vice-president of the Orthodox Union, who has a PhD in psychology, said that just as Jews transition from the darkness of Yom Hazikaron, the memorial day for fallen soldiers, to the light of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day, we must transition from "a darkness within us… that is eating away at the soul of the Jewish people."

Discord, despair and cynicism – which he described as "three monsters" – are "crippling us as a nation, as local communities, and as individual Jews," said Rabbi Weinreb.

He referred to gaps between religious and secular Jews, right-wing and left-wing Jews, chassidim of differing factions, and those who wear one colour kippah and those who wear a different one.

"It is a poison that eats away at us body and soul."

Rabbi Weinreb believes the Jewish community has become pessimistic. "Where is a prophet today who gives a hopeful message for the Jewish future?" he asked.

Cynicism, Rabbi Weinreb said, is at the core of the difficulties. "When we see the accomplishments of others, particularly of a different shade of religiosity than ours, we say, 'So what? I'm not impressed.'

"Yom Ha'atzmaut, particularly this 60th [one], gives us the opportunity to grab these three monsters, to slay these three dragons, and to transform the discord into unity and harmony, the despair into hope, and the cynicism into idealism and dreaming again."

Rabbi Weinreb said that Ahavat Yisrael – love of one's fellow Jew – is commonly espoused but rarely practised, "especially when the going is tough, or when the person is different.

"Harmony – at least, tolerance – is a goal we must achieve."

He urged people to see the beauty of others' accomplishments "even if we don't understand that beauty," and to not forget "the dreams of our grandmothers… the pushkes that helped build the land of Israel.

"Let us not become cynical, no matter who are our leaders," he said. "We must continue to dream. We must reverse discord with unity, despair with hope and cynicism with dreams of the future."

The event, which was followed by celebratory dancing in the synagogue's social hall, also included prayers, a medley of Israeli music, and remarks from Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto; Solly Sacks, director of World Mizrachi; and Rabbi Baruch Taub, spiritual leader of the synagogue.

Former envoy credits 'hard work, blood, tears and dedication'

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — "Nothing short of a miracle" was the theme repeated again and again in Halifax May 8 by speakers at Israel@60, a celebration of Israel's 60th birthday.

Yet Alon Pinkas, former Israeli consul general to New York and a longtime adviser to Israeli presidents, premiers and military leaders, as well as a Jerusalem Post columnist and investment adviser, told 300 members of the Halifax Jewish community, that Israel's success "has nothing to do with miracles.

"It was hard work, blood, tears and dedication that turned a country that was proclaimed an independent state in 1948, with 600,000 Jews and 1.6 million British pounds, living among 130 million Arabs, into what it is today."

He joked. "You'd be thrown out of Las Vegas if you asked for odds and wanted to bet on Israel's success against that 60 years ago."

Referring to negative media coverage of Israel, he asked "Why is it an issue that Israel can continue to exist, that Israel can survive another 60 years?"

He said Israel is a normal place. "The people are not what the world perceives as Arab-killing, khaki-wearing pioneers. Israel is different people from different places working to foster the country's reputation as a leader in economics, science, technology. It's the only country where the people are threatened and imperilled, but continue to fight back – because it is a country, with a flag, independence and something to live for."

Held at Pier 21, the Halifax gateway for immigrants from 1921 to 1973, the large reception and dining room was festively decorated, and tributes to Israel's success were depicted on a large screen.

After speakers from the Jewish National Fund and United Israel Appeal Federations Canada praised Israel's triumphs, Marcia Cantor, executive director of State of Israel Bonds for Ottawa and Atlantic Canada, implored the audience to try to destroy the negative image portrayed of Israel by the mainstream media.

Yet Pinkas cautioned that the increase in the Palestinian birthrate compared to that of Israelis should be cause for concern.

"Israel is faced with its greatest dilemma since [founding prime minister David] Ben-Gurion decided whether to develop the state. If Palestinians are granted the vote, by 2020, Israelis will be outnumbered," he said.

Thousands rally to celebrate in Montreal

BY JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Thousands gathered in downtown Montreal for a joyous mid-day celebration of the State of Israel's 60th anniversary last Thursday.

Place du Canada was filled with Israeli flags, big and small, waving in the gentle breeze, as a band played favourite Hebrew songs. An attempt was made to break the Guinness world record for the largest horah, and the assembled, estimated at 15,000 by the organizers, made a valiant effort, led by veteran Israeli folkdance teacher Peter Smolash.

More than 80 school buses brought participants in from the Montreal area, as well as from Kingston. Organized groups also came in from Ottawa and Sherbrooke.

In the midst of the spirited stepping were Public Security Minister Stockwell Day and Liberal leader Stéphane Dion, the two guest speakers, both of whom opened their greetings in Hebrew.

Day said that Israel is "a beacon of hope and light" in the Middle East and that his government will stand firmly with the state as "storm clouds gather on the horizon" once again.

He said there are those today who, as in 1948, want to destroy the dream that Jews held for 2,000 years of returning to Jerusalem.

"Israel stood firm in its belief in the promise of its own land, fought and won," he said, to cheers. "This time, when the music stops, we have to continue to stand together with Israel."

He denounced those who say Israel has no right to exist and any comparison between Zionism and apartheid.

Dion underlined Canada's historic friendship with Israel and praised the courage and tenacity of the Jewish people, who despite having been victims of the worst atrocities, continue to strongly uphold democratic values.

"There can be no peace without security, and peace is not the absence of war, it is the concord of the people… Israelis and Palestinians."

Dion said "the world needs Israel," and noted that eight Nobel prizes have been awarded to Israelis, and that others have made great achievements in fields from literature to solar energy development.

The secret to contentment

It's better to want what you have than to have what you want.

I met a lovely woman from Israel, Amira Liwer, who was here with her husband, Dr. Yoram Liwer, the CEO of the Mynei Hyeshua Medical Center in Bnei Brak, a hospital whose philosophy is that "every minute of human life is valuable."

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

Hearing about this hospital made a strong impression on me. But Mrs. Liwer made an equally strong impression on me. In her humility, kindness and quiet grace, she reminded me of my beloved late grandmother.

When I asked her to tell me more about the 48 qualities and traits that one needs in order to really understand, absorb and identify with the Torah, she kindly offered to help. From Israel, she sent me some books, accompanied by a beautiful letter. One of the books, Visions of the Fathers by Rabbi Abraham J. Twerski, a medical doctor, addresses those 48 qualities.

The 48 qualities are very similar to life- coaching values and ideas. The one that struck me the most was "being happy with one's lot." Again, this reminded me of my late grandmother and of how she was always happy with the simplest things in life. As long as her family was around her, she was always at peace and self-contented, and her riches were a houseful of plants and flowers, and lots of love in her home and her heart, and at her Shabbat table.

Being happy with one's lot in life – how can we achieve that?

According to Rabbi Twerski, "The more a person understands that his neshamah is Divine and that he can unite with God, the less he will be concerned with earthly needs. Being happy with one's lot leads to greater acquisition of Torah, which in turn increases the happiness with one's lot. The true Torah scholar experiences a positive self-reinforcing cycle."

Self-contentment also comes from being infinitely positive and having a positive outlook on life. Often a good attitude rubs off on those around us. Try being infinitely positive for just one week and notice what changes around you and inside of you. And when it comes to health and well-being, we have to begin by being at peace with ourselves, our choices and our "lot' in life.

I spoke to Rabbi Adina Lewittes, who had wonderful things to say about self-acceptance and contentment.

"Rav Soloveitchik taught something very important about this subject. He taught that holiness is found not in the answers or neatly fitting pieces of our lives, but rather in paradox – in the places where things don't always fit together," she says.

"The challenge of human existence is to build a life with all the often conflicting and dissonant pieces of who we are, and hold them all together in one indivisible whole… When we can embrace ourselves and others with all our rights and wrongs, our successes and failures, with all our contradictions and imperfections, we will have taken a step towards wholeness, towards shlemut, towards peaceful self-acceptance."

A close friend of mine, Ellen, says being happy with her lot in life is the motto she lives by.

"Everybody has a 'peckle,' as my grandmother used to say," Ellen notes. "There is no point in being jealous of someone and how much they have or possess, or what good luck they acquire, because everybody has a 'peckle,' or a burden, and you don't know what's going on in anybody else's life. So to be happy with your lot in life is to be happy with everything you've got. Someone is always going to have more than you," she says.

My friend derives satisfaction and happiness from the close relationships in her life, with her friends, her family and her husband. Simplicity, humility and modesty are characteristics of some of the most self-contented people I have ever known – all of whom are happy with their lot in life, whatever it may be.

Mosaic festival returns June 1

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The second annual Jewish Mosaic Festival is set to run at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on June 1.

The all-day event highlights multiculturalism within the Jewish community by showcasing cultural practices and artifacts of Judaica from around the world.

Highlights include children's programs, Judaica, fashion, food and music, as well as a display area representing different countries. Basketball players can also sign up in advance for a three-on-three tournament representing their country of origin.

One exhibition, Route to Your Roots, includes an "antique roadshow," in which Dorion Liebgott, curator of the Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum at Beth Tzedec Congregation, and Sharon Berlin, of Cartouche Art and Antique Consulting, will look at visitors' family treasures and photos.

In a photography exhibit titled Out of the Frame, teens document their experiences immigrating to Canada, and visitors have the chance to share their family history by adding photos, stories, recipes and responses to the exhibit.

Another exhibit, Makom: Seeking Sacred Space, looks at how sacred space is created, experienced, preserved and transformed over time. It features photos of former synagogues in Montreal by David Kaufman and a series by David Cowles on former synagogues in North Africa.

One room will be set aside for people who have adopted children from around the world to meet each other.

The day will culminate in a one-hour coffee house with entertainment, followed by a talk by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, and Susan Jackson, executive director of the Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage.

Among the countries being represented are Argentina, Barbados, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Czech Republic/Slovakia, Ethiopia, India, Iraq, Israel, Morocco, Peru, Poland, Romania, Russia, Tunisia, Turkey, Uruguay, Yemen, Algeria and Iran.

Joanna Sasson Morrison, co-ordinator of community development services at Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, and a festival committee member, said that a major part of the festival will be the sharing of stories. "The entire festival is from a personal point of view. We're bringing together segments of the community that often feel isolated."

Janet Klein Slavens, supervisor of adult services and special needs at the BJCC and also a festival committee member, said that the representatives of each country planned their own exhibit.

All daytime events are free, and the evening program is $10. To sign up for the basketball tournament and buy nighttime event tickets, call 416-636-1880 ext. 0

Olmert probe focuses on his time as trade minister

By JONATHAN LIS
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The alleged illegal receipt by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of hundreds of thousands of dollars from American businessman and fundraiser Morris Talansky is currently being investigated by police.

The Israeli prime minister is accused of receiving bribes from Talansky when he served as mayor of Jerusalem and as minister of industry, trade and labour.

The probe is now focused on Olmert's tenure as industry and trade minister in the Sharon government – not on the mayoral election campaigns for which he said he had received funding from Talansky, sources involved in the probe told Ha'aretz.

However, Ha'aretz has learned that the debts of an organization that campaigned for Olmert's election as mayor of Jerusalem were covered out of funds received from Talansky.

Olmert said Friday that the investigation deals with donations to the 1999 and 2002 campaigns for the Jerusalem mayoralty and the Likud party primary.

The prime minister further said the funds were also intended to cover losses. He said he met Talansky 20 years ago and acknowledged receiving funds from him. Olmert added that they were campaign contributions he got when he twice ran for mayor of Jerusalem and that he never kept any money for himself or took bribes.

However, the sources said investigators were primarily gathering incriminating evidence about Olmert's activities circa 2005.

Last Thursday, Olmert said he will resign if he is indicted in a new criminal investigation. Olmert made the statement from his Jerusalem residence after an Israeli court lifted a gag order on the case at the request of police.

Ehud Olmert

In his statement, Olmert said he received campaign donations for his mayoral campaign and his bid to head the Likud party from Talansky of Woodmere, N.Y., who has been questioned by Israeli police. Olmert said the funds were raised legally for his campaigns.

It remains unclear what, if anything, Olmert did in return for the funds.

Israeli officials stressed that Talansky's questioning should not be construed as implying that an indictment will be served to Olmert. Talansky was asked to provide a preliminary statement because he happened to be in the country and it may be needed if an indictment is eventually served.

The police decided to ask for a lifting of the gag order on the Israeli media following a three-hour meeting of the investigating police team with Attorney General Menahem Mazuz and State Attorney Moshe Lador.

The gag order had lost its significance, police said, because of foreign media reports. The New York Post released Talansky's name on its website.

Israel concerned over possibly upgraded rockets

For Israel, which suffered surprise setbacks in its offensive against Hezbollah two years ago, it dawned that the radical Shiite movement may be proving resilient enough to eventually seize control of Lebanon.

The Israeli defence establishment is particularly concerned about Hezbollah's relationship with Iran and the possibility that it is upgrading its rocket arsenal with Tehran's help.

Essentially that would mean Iran flanks Israel from the north and the south, where it already established a foothold by bankrolling the Gaza Strip's rejectionist Hamas rulers.

It's not just future border wars that Jerusalem fears, but also the prospect of Iran trying to fend off efforts to foil its nuclear program by ordering retaliatory attacks by Hezbollah and Hamas against Israel.

On Sunday, former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak said Hezbollah's persistent attempts to take over Lebanon could eventually benefit Israel in its struggle against the militant group.

"If an armed conflict erupts, it will be simpler to strike Lebanon when Hezbollah is the legitimate ruler," Shahak told the Army Radio.

For Siniora, the short-term solution to dealing with Hezbollah appears to be appeasement. Though the embattled prime minister said Saturday that Lebanon "will not fall to the putschists," he did, in fact, yield to the group's demands.

The recent violence erupted after the Siniora government vowed to dismantle a Hezbollah-run phone network and remove a surveillance camera planted by the militia at Beirut's airport. Hezbollah backed down only after the Lebanese army said it would refuse to implement Siniora's edicts, which had been billed as preserving the country's sovereignty.

Also on Sunday, Israel's deputy prime minister, Haim Ramon, told the cabinet that Lebanon must be seen as a "Hezbollah state," after the Shiite guerrilla group seized control over the western part of the Lebanese capital over the weekend.

"Lebanon has no government. It is a fiction, there is only Hezbollah," Ramon said during the weekly cabinet meeting. "Hezbollah is directly responsible for everything that happens [in Lebanon], and the organization completely controls the state."

Later in the cabinet meeting, minister Ami Ayalon called for an emergency meeting of the political-security cabinet to discuss the ongoing crisis in Lebanon and Gaza.

Ayalon said that "the critical situation in the north" and the impending lull in the fighting in Gaza require a special session.

Also during the meeting, the chief of military intelligence, Amos Yadlin, said Lebanon has been embroiled in a political crisis since former Lebanese president Emile Lahoud completed his term and stepped down last fall.

Referring to Lebanon's inability to appoint a new president since then, Yadlin said "there is a consensus regarding the identity of a president, and that is Lebanese army commander, Gen. Michel Suleiman, but the objective of the extreme camp goes far beyond the selection of a president. They want to restore the balance of power in Lebanon to what it was before the anti-Syrian revolution."

According to Yadlin, "in the beginning, Hezbollah tried to do it in democratic ways, and later via non-violent demonstrations, and they failed, and that is why they advanced to a move involving a military force."

Minister of Religious Services Yitzhak Cohen said that "Israel must immediately ask the [United Nations] Security Council to hold renewed discussions over resolution 1701."

He was referring to the resolution that ended the 34-day conflict between Israel and Hezbollah in 2006, maintaining a fragile ceasefire.

According to Cohen, "the Lebanese army proved to be a doormat, stepped on by Hezbollah."

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel is following the violence in Lebanon closely, but will refrain from intervening.

Deputy Defence Minister Matan Vilnai told Army Radio Sunday that Israel is prepared for the possibility that the situation in Lebanon will deteriorate into another civil war.

Vilnai also said the current sectarian fighting could end with a Hezbollah takeover of the government.

"We need to keep our eyes peeled and be especially sensitive regarding all that is happening there," Vilnai told Army Radio.

"We shouldn't get involved. We need to watch and should follow this very closely even when we are dealing with other fronts," he said, referring to continued fighting against the Iranian-backed Islamist group Hamas, which has controlled Gaza since last June.

"Israel is especially concerned about the situation in Lebanon in light of Hamas' control of Gaza," Vilnai said.

"Hamas and Hezbollah, as Iranian proxies, are mutually dependent," he said.

Cabinet minister Meir Sheetrit said Israel should not yet take any action, but warned that things could change if Hezbollah takes over Lebanon.

"I think it's very dangerous, the [possible] situation in which Iran is in fact sitting on our border, and controlling Lebanon," Sheetrit said. "It's really dangerous in the long term because now its plain to everyone that… Hezbollah is just the long arm of Iran, and that's the way we should relate to it."

For the time being, Jerusalem has decided not to issue any official comment on the confrontations between Hezbollah and the Lebanese government. But various officials have expressed concern over the escalation and the possible implications for Israel's northern border.

Dan Gillerman, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, voiced hope that the United States and France – Lebanon's former colonial ruler – might be able to find a diplomatic solution.

Such pressure on Iran and Syria might bring about "some sort of accord, some sort of calm," he told Israel Radio.

"There aren't many options. To say that I'm optimistic would be an exaggeration."

Think-tank launches Israel @ 60 ad contest

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Would-be Spielbergs, Kubricks and Coens take note: your directorial skills are being requested to help promote and defend Israel on this, its 60th anniversary.

The Israel Project – a Washington-based, non-profit think-tank dedicated to advocating for the Jewish state – is running a contest that will reward novice directors, writers and artists with $20,000 in prize money for those who display "a passion for showing the real Israel."

The Israel @ 60 contest was conceived by Israel Project staff to "combat the increasing exploitation of the Internet by terrorist groups and others, seeking to celebrate the killing of innocents… and reclaim the Internet as a safe space" to demonstrate the peaceful and democratic nature of Israel, said Israel Project president Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi.

Israel Project president Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi

The contest, open to U.S., Canadian and international contestants over 16, is divided into three submission categories: a 30-second TV advertisement, a 30-second to seven-minute video and an 8- by 11-inch printable flyer.

Submissions in English, Spanish, German, French, Arabic and Russian will be accepted.

And the winner of the English TV ad will have his or her spot air on CNN during the U.S. Democratic and Republican national conventions later this year.

The contest opened in March and submissions are being accepted until June 30. Winners will be announced July 31 after judging by project staff.

Video entries are being posted to a YouTube site (www.youtube.com/group/ israel60) set up by the project where fans will be asked to submit votes on their favourites. The votes will be used to help the judges find a winner.

As of last week, the YouTube site had just two video postings and only seven members.

"All major terrorist organizations… maintain modern websites where they boast, in a variety of languages, of their attacks on civilians. People should be able to surf the 'Net without hitting sites that glorify murder, recruit suicide attackers and promulgate anti-Israel propaganda," Laszlo Mizrahi said. "We hope that this contest will spark the creativity of the pro-Israel community around the world to put forward its enthusiasm and ideas."

Commander of Exodus dies at 90

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — Yossi Harel, the commander of the legendary ship Exodus, died last month, on April 26, at the age of 90.

Harel, who sailed the azure waters of the Mediterranean four times on clandestine journeys between 1945 and 1948, brought a total of 24,000 Holocaust survivors to the shores of what would soon become the State of Israel.

Harel was remembered as a hero by his former comrades, the Jewish refugees he helped bring to Israel and the leaders of the country.

He was "modest, a brave fighter and a hero who did not seek acts of heroism," said Shaul Biber, a fellow former fighter in the Palmach, Israel's commando strike force.

When he secretly set sail from France on the Exodus, a rickety former Chesapeake Bay steamer originally called the President Warwick, Harel could not have known that the voyage would become legendary.

The boat left on July 11, 1947, with 4,553 Jewish refugees on board and headed toward Palestine until it was intercepted by British navy vessels. The British commanders ordered that the refugees not be allowed into Palestine, then under British control, and be sent back to Europe.

Yossi Harel, commander of the Exodus, brought 24,000 Holocaust survivors to Israel between 1945 and 1948.

But the defiant Harel and his skipper planned a daring escape from under the nose of the British destroyer that was escorting them. They shut off the ship's lights in the dead of night and swiftly changed the ship's course, heading for Palestine.

The British intercepted the Exodus, hitting the ship's bow and attempting to board the boat. Passengers tried to repel the British forces by hurling potatoes and canned goods at them. A British soldier and three Jews were killed in the clashes, including an American volunteer sailor from San Francisco, before Harel ordered his passengers to surrender.

The refugees were taken to Haifa and put on ships headed back to Europe.

Among those who witnessed the dramatic scene of the refugees disembarking from the Exodus in Haifa only to be loaded onto three other ships headed back for the continent were members of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine.

The officials said later that seeing the unfortunate journey of those refugees up close spurred them to push for a resolution to the question of Palestine and the Jews who wanted to make it their home.

For its role in galvanizing world opinion in favour of a Jewish state, the Exodus became known as the ship that helped launch the Jewish state.

The dimensions of its story, including the return of the refugees to Europe and their eventual landing in Germany, was covered widely by the international media. The story was mythologized in the 1958 novel Exodus, by Leon Uris, as well as a hit film starring Paul Newman in a loose portrayal of Harel.

For Jews and non-Jews, the book and film painted a romantic, heroic picture of the Zionist cause, doing wonders for the young state's image.

Years later, in the Soviet Union, illegal copies of the book were circulated among young Jews, turning them into avid Zionists. Among them were the leaders of the movement to free Soviet Jews and allow their immigration to Israel.

Harel, who was 28 when he was the Exodus commander, went on to a career in the Israeli army's intelligence corps in the early years of the state. He later went into business and reportedly also worked for the Mossad.

During a visit to Los Angeles in 1948, he met an American woman who would become his wife.

"I saw a man in uniform facing me, impressive and handsome, and I fell in love with him immediately," Julie Harel was quoted this week by the Israeli daily Ma'ariv. "We were married and since then we were never apart. It's hard for me to imagine life without him.

"His life," she said, "was interwoven with the history of the State of Israel."

Israel getting charged up over electric cars

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — In a land of high gas prices and no oil resources, Israel is positioning itself to lead the world into the age of the electric car.

With $200 million in funding from private investors and enthusiastic support from the Israeli government, a young Israeli high-tech multimillionaire, Shai Agassi, is laying the groundwork for Israel to become the first test case for the gasoline-free electric car.

His company is planning to establish a network of battery-recharging areas across Israel by 2011. Renault-Nissan will begin introducing electric cars to the Israeli market as soon as next year.

"What we are doing is something that should have happened already," said Dafna Agassi, the marketing director of the Israel office of Shai Agassi's Project Better Place, which is based in California.

"The consumer pays for gas, and the prices are going up every day. The solution is here – it's the electric car."

Given Israel's small size, dearth of oil resources and location in an oil-rich yet hostile neighbourhood, the Jewish state is an ideal testing ground for the electric auto.

Eager to reduce the country's dependence on gasoline and reduce car-generated pollution, the Israeli government already has pledged to offer significant tax incentives for buyers of electronic cars. If successful, the electric car venture could make Israel the world's leader in the industry.

That's precisely what Agassi and the Israeli government want.

"Think about what happened with Finland and Nokia – it sprung an entire industry," Dafna Agassi said of the mobile phone phenomenon. "We are starting the field here. Imagine bringing this to other countries and the potential impact is huge."

The cars will run on lithium-iron batteries, provided by Project Better Place, that should last for about 124 miles before needing to be recharged. This should suit the typical Israeli driver, who on average drives fewer than 45 miles a day. For longer trips, battery swap stations will serve as a safety net, the company said.

"Environmentally, I thought it's the best idea I've ever heard of, and secondly, it made a lot of financial sense," said Idan Ofer, a leading Israeli businessman and the project's main investor.

Ofer spoke to JTA by phone from his SUV, which he said he plans to trade in for an electric car next year.

By "deploying faster than any other country on the planet," Israel will map out and discover the best ways to implement the electric-car system, he said. Project Better Place can then take that know-how to other countries and traffic-clogged cities.

Ofer said he plans to bring the idea to China, where he has shares in a local car company.

Renault-Nissan will be the first to bring its electric cars to Israel, but the market soon will open to other companies.

"Zero emission, zero noise," Renault-Nissan Chief Executive Carlos Ghosn said when he was in Jerusalem last January to inaugurate the project. "It will be the most environmentally friendly mass-produced car on the market."

Although electric cars are expected to reduce emissions and make Israeli cities quieter, they will still use fossil fuels. For the time being, the power stations that supply energy to the recharging points will run mostly on coal and oil.

"As I understand it, it has no relation to alternative energy," said Micha Asscher, a professor of physical chemistry at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. "It's a nice idea that our cars will gradually be driven by electric power – for the quiet and less pollution in the cities – but it is not alternative energy."

By contrast, in Denmark – which signed on to the project after Israel – power stations are fuelled at least in part by wind power.

According to Ofer, whose family holdings include oil refineries, Israel is making a gradual transition to more environmentally friendly sources of energy for its power stations, including the country's most plentiful resource – solar power.

Conversion controversy rears head in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A decision by a haredi rabbinic appeal court in Israel has called into question the legitimacy of thousands of conversions by a respected Israeli halachic authority and prompted a heated and strongly worded rebuke from an Orthodox rabbis' group.

At the same time, two rabbis associated with the Toronto Vaad Harabonim (Orthodox rabbinical council) say the Israeli decision will likely have no impact on conversions approved by the council's beit din (rabbinical court).

In Montreal, meanwhile, the Israeli decision received the full support of the Orthodox Jewish Community Council, whose spokesperson, Rabbi Saul Emanuel, said "we will honour and respect this judgement."

The case in question, addressed by Rabbi Martin Lockshin in this week's CJN Perspectives essay, concerns an Ashdod man who claimed he need not divorce or grant a settlement to his wife because her conversion 15 years before by Rabbi Chaim Druckman was flawed and insincere.

The local rabbinic court agreed and annulled the marriage, ruling his wife was still a gentile, as were their three children. That decision was upheld on appeal by Rabbi Avraham Sherman, whose ruling brought into question all conversions by Rabbi Druckman and the Conversion Authority.

The Authority was established under former prime minister Ariel Sharon to manage a huge backlog of cases prompted by the immigration of thousands of Russian gentiles. Rabbi Lockshin said some people might see the case as one that illustrates the decline of modern Orthodoxy and its replacement by haredi Judaism.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, president of the Toronto Vaad Harabonim, took a narrower approach. He said the Israeli ruling appears to be limited to the facts of the case and to conversions performed by Rabbi Druckman and his state-sanctioned Conversion Authority.

Rabbi Moshe Stern, a long-standing member of the Toronto beit din, said conversions performed by Toronto's Orthodox rabbinic court have never been challenged by the rabbinate in Israel or by other religious authorities. However, Rabbi Stern said he was "saddened" by a controversy that is pitting an Orthodox court against a highly respected rabbi.

"Rabbi Druckman is an honorable, Orthodox, well-respected, well-known Torah scholar and teacher who heads a well-known yeshivah," he said. "Knowing Rabbi Druckman, what he stands for, his commitment to Israel and the Torah, I personally would not reject a conversion he was part of."

In New York, the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), which speaks for 1,000 Orthodox rabbis in North America and Israel, issued a blistering news release calling the Israeli court's decision "entirely beyond the pale of acceptable halachic practice."

The ruling by the Bet Din Elyon and its language and tone "violate numerous Torah laws regarding converts and their families, create a massive desecration of God's name, insult outstanding rabbinic leaders and halachic scholars in Israel and are a reprehensible cause of widespread conflict and animosity within the Jewish people and beyond. The RCA is appalled that such a ruling has been issued by that court," the news release stated.

The RCA called on Israel's chief rabbis "to reaffirm their support of the Conversion Authority and its leadership in clear and unambiguous terms at the earliest possible time. Until that will happen, each passing day will cause reprehensible anguish to halachic converts, irreparable harm to the fabric of the Jewish people and a considerable debasement of the good name of Torah, Halachah and tradition."

In his analysis, Rabbi Lockshin sees a political dimension to the halachic disputes: "State rabbinic courts are increasingly run by rabbis who are inimical to the values of modernity and unconcerned about the issues of Israeli society at large," he asserts.

He suggests there is no halachic precedent for retroactively annulling conversion and doing so "is a bludgeon being used for political ends."

Rabbi Emanuel, executive director of the Jewish Community Council of Montreal (Vaad Ha'ir), said the Israeli decision "is in conformity with the legal scholars of Israel, and we will follow those rulings."

He said the Montreal rabbinic court would "question" any conversions by Rabbi Druckman "and based on the judgement that was given, they would not be looked at very favourably."

He noted, however, examining conversions carried out in Israel rarely occurs. More often, it is Montreal conversions that must past muster in Israel.

Rabbi Tradburks believes Rabbi Sherman acted with "honesty and integrity" in weighing all the facts before making the determination he did.

Rabbi Tradburks acknowledged that some might see the case as one in which "the haredi community is trying to disenfranchise the national religious community," and is doing so for political reasons.

"I may not like the decision… and some legal aspects of it can be disputed, but I'm uncomfortable in politicizing the case," he said. "I don't like the impugning of political motives.

"It is not a political effort by haredim to impugn the conversions of Orthodox strands of Judaism. It was strictly decided on the facts."

At the same time, he continued, "I feel bad that a great leader like Rabbi Druckman has been besmirched."

He said the rabbinic judge faced "a conundrum" – deciding the case on its own merits while putting to the side the implications the decision would have on other conversions.

"The immigration of hundreds of thousands of [non-Jewish] Russians has caused a real dilemma, for which I'm not sure there is a solution. If you do conversions with leniency, this is what is going to happen," he said.

Population tops 7 million

The population of Israel, which celebrated its 60th birthday last week, has reached almost 7.3 million, the statistics office announced. With 7.28 million inhabitants, Israel's population is nine times higher than when the Jewish state was founded in May 1948. Over the past year 156,400 babies were born, and 18,000 immigrants arrived, leading to a 1.8 per cent population increase. Some 5.5 million Israelis are Jews and 1.5 million are Arabs, while 53 per cent of the population lives in the Tel Aviv metropolitan area.

Rav Kook a key builder

Rabbi Avraham Issac Kook was most influential in building the State of Israel, a new poll says. The religious Zionist leader, who served as the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi before the Jewish state was even established, topped a survey that asked Israelis to rank Jewish leaders according to their contribution to the state. David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, was second in the Ynet-Gesher Society poll, conducted for Israel's 60th birthday. The late Lubavitcher rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson, and Zionism founder Theodor Herzl came third and fourth. The phone survey contacted thousands of adult, Jewish, Hebrew-speaking Israelis. No margin of error was provided.

Israelis die in Bolivia

Five Israeli hikers on a post-army trip died in a car crash in Bolivia. Two tourist jeeps collided late Thursday in Salar de Uyuni, a remote Bolivian salt flat, bursting into flames before their passengers could escape. Thirteen people were killed, including four young Israeli women who had been friends since childhood and were travelling together after their military service. Another Israeli, a young man who had U.S. citizenship, also died.

No three-way summit

There will be no U.S.-Israeli-Palestinian summit during U.S. President George W. Bush's Middle East tour. "This did not seem the time for a big high-level, three-way event with the president and the prime minister [Ehud Olmert] and [PA] President [Mahmoud] Abbas," Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, said in a briefing outlining Bush's visit. "It just doesn't feel right as the best way to advance the negotiations." Bush leaves May 13 for Israel where, he plans to join in 60th anniversary celebrations, including a tour of Masada and an address to the Knesset. In addition to Israel and Egypt, he will visit Saudi Arabia during his tour.

Reform shul gets funds

The Reform movement in Israel celebrated its first state-funded synagogue. The new synagogue, located in Modi'in, halfway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, was dedicated last week. It was given the name Yozma, meaning "initiative." It's also an acronym standing for "Contemporary Judaism, the nation's heritage." It's the first Reform shul in Israel to be established with government funding.

More Iranian invective

As Israel celebrated 60 years of independence, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called it a "stinking corpse" that's doomed to disappear. "Those who think they can revive the stinking corpse of the usurping and fake Israeli regime by throwing a birthday party are seriously mistaken," Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying by the official IRNA news agency.

1948...They Were There

Fledgling nation fired his passion

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Joseph (Joe) Warner flipped through the laminated pages of his album, glancing at old black-and-white photographs of himself in various poses and moods. On the first page was a passport-size picture of Warner, looking solemn, dashing and young with a fuzzy mustache, a goatee and what appears to be a military uniform. On the next few pages were photographs of Warner and his gung-ho comrades-in-arms in an exotic, besieged country far from his familiar surroundings in Canada. The remaining photographs were eclectic, showing the barren coastline of of an underdeveloped land, a British Tegart fort pockmarked with holes in its whitewashed walls, artillery pieces sitting in a desert landscape, a fishing boat bobbing in the Mediterranean Sea, friends kibbitzing around and fetching, smiling women.

Those were the days.

The photographs, at once serious and jocular, remind Warner, 82, of a time and a place etched deeply into his consciousness. In 1948, shortly after Israel declared independence and thereby brought the wrath of the Arab world upon itself, Warner – a Jewish boy from Toronto who joined the Royal Canadian Air Force in 1943 after a stint as an apprentice pharmacist – volunteered to fight for the struggling Jewish state.

One of 3,500 foreign volunteers, or machalniks, from 37 countries who went to Israel to take part in the War of Independence, Warner laid his life on the line for a fledgling nation that fired his passion and imagination. Trained as wireless air gunner in Canada, Warner was assigned to an anti-tank unit in support of an infantry formation, the Givati Brigade. A company clerk and medic, he saw action in southern and northern Israel before being sidelined by a minor knee wound.

The unit to which he was posted was commanded by a decorated American war veteran, Lester Gorn, and consisted of 82 men, 80 of whom hailed from the United States, Canada, Britain and South Africa and two of whom were English-speaking Sabras. Of the 80, seven were Canadians.

Warner, a graduate of Harbord Collegiate who had never belonged to a Zionist youth group, arrived in Israel in June 1948, about a month after its emergence as a sovereign state. He volunteered for Machal after listening to a radio broadcast announcing the United Nations partition of Palestine, then a British mandate. "If we lost the chance of statehood, it wouldn't be worth a nickel to be a Jew," he said.

The fourth of six children of Sam and Helen Warner, he divulged his plans to his parents following a Passover meal. His mother, though apprehensive, was supportive. His father, a tailor, urged him to reconsider in light of the fact that one of his sons, Murray, had already served in the Canadian armed forces in Europe for four years as the first Jewish officer in the Grenadier Guards.

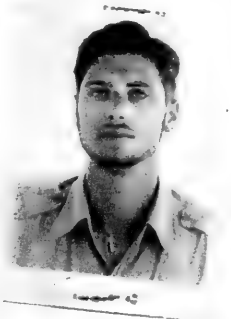
But Warner, who signed up for Machal at a secret recruiting centre, had made up his mind. He left Toronto at the end of April with a group of 17 volunteers aged 17 to 22, not knowing whether he was legally entitled to be a soldier in Israel. The first leg of their trip was financed by two local businessmen, D. Lou Harris and Sam Dunkelman, whose son, Ben, would distinguish himself as a commander in the1948 Arab-Israeli war.

"We were sent to New York City and instructed not to sit together in the train," he said. Later, they boarded a Polish ship bound for Naples, Italy. "We got off at Cannes, in France, and were taken to a displaced persons camp in Marseilles, where we posed as Holocaust survivors." Then they were dispatched to a deserted farm nearby. There they waited impatiently.

"One night, a truck suddenly appeared. We were transported to a village and then placed on a fishing boat that had been purchased in Newfoundland."

Since the creaky vessel was not totally seaworthy, it hugged the coast as it sailed toward Israel. "We had a lot of fun. Sometimes, we stopped for a swim in the sea."

They landed in Israel shortly before the first of two truces in the War of Independence went into effect on June 11. The boat dropped them off at an inhospitable stretch of sand dunes in what is now the wealthy seaside Tel Aviv suburb of Herzliya Pituach. "We arrived during the day," he recalled, saying that his first impression of Israel was that of a hot, dry land. "The welcoming committee gave us each an orange and a stale bun." They were driven to a base near Hadera, and en route, Warner saw a camel caravan. He applied for a position in the air force, but since Israel had no bombers his skills as a wireless air gunner were irrelevant.



Joe Warner as a young machalnik

Warner, who had been an air cadet in a Toronto squadron sponsored by the B'nai Brith, had trained to be a gunner in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta after having fallen short of his goal to be a pilot. When he finally finished his course in 1945, the war was winding down and his services were no longer required. Subsequently schooled in jungle warfare in case the war with Japan escalated, he spent the remaining months in the armed forces as a police officer.

Having been unable to join Israel's air force, which had the largest Machal presence, he joined its ragtag army. The first skirmishes in which he participated were near the coastal town of Atlit. "We cleaned up (Arab) villages sniping at convoys coming from Haifa." Moved southward, his unit, based near Rehovot, helped clear a road so that men and materiel could be funnelled to the Negev.

During the months of September and October, his unit stormed hostile Arab villages. "When the Arabs realized they were losing, they ran like hell." Warner's squad also took a former British fortress held by the Egyptian army and seized an air base at Hatzor held by the Egyptians.

The Egyptian troops he faced were poorly trained and their officers displayed little or no resolve. But the Sudanese soldiers in their ranks were tough and fearless. Initially armed with captured Egyptian anti-tank guns, Warner's unit later used German-made equipment bought from Czechoslovakia.

During a battle in late October, following the collapse of the second ceasefire, Warner was hit by shrapnel. His knee wound was tended to by doctors at a base in Sarafand. After three weeks, he was sent for further treatment at a Kupat Holim clinic in Tel Aviv. With the war almost over, he picked oranges and toured the country. When hostilities ceased in the winter of 1949, Warner hung around, figuring that fighting would resume. By then, he had fallen in love with Sarah Cohen, his wife-to-be. "She was the fourth Sarah Cohen I had met in Israel."

After returning to Toronto for surgery and to continue his studies, Warner went back to Israel to marry Cohen, whose father, a member of the Third Aliyah, was the proprietor of the Esther Cinema in Tel Aviv and of the biggest metal bed factory in the Middle East. He and Sarah, who had two sons, were married in 1951 and lived with her parents in what was then the northern edge of Tel Aviv.

Warner earned a living as a functionary in the Jewish Agency and as a book and baby carriage salesman. The couple settled in Toronto in 1956 when Pfizer, a pharmaceutical company, hired him. He went back to Israel five years later when Pfizer opened a branch there. He and Sarah – who died in 1998 – remained in Israel until the summer of 1973.

Warner, who has since remarried and now heads an organization called American & Canadian Veterans of Israel, looks back at his Machal years with great pride. "We did a big job," he said, sadly noting that 11 Canadian Machal volunteers were killed in battle. "I'm not a hero. I did a job that had to be done."

Hawkish in his views of the Arab-Israeli conflict, Warner is less than optimistic that it can be resolved peacefully.

"It's like the Hatfields and McCoys," he said. But he is certain that Israel will prevail and survive. "We won't let ourselves be pushed around anymore."

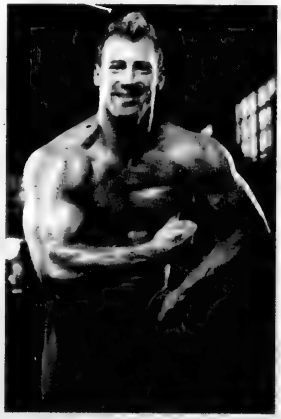
Victim of bullying becomes a body builder

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

At five-feet-nine and 210 pounds, it's easy to judge Rick Rotchild by his tanned, rock-solid exterior.

Preconceptions of vanity and self-obsession come to mind at first glance of his body-builder frame, but Rotchild is a benevolent man who focuses his efforts on improving the lives of troubled youth and giving back to the community.

According to Rotchild, body building is more about achieving personal goals rather than bulking up and it's a sport that has helped him make positive changes in his life.



Rick Rotchild balances his love for body building with his commitment to social work.

In his adolescent years, Rotchild was bullied at school and eventually turned into a bully himself. He channelled some of his aggression by working out in his high school weight room. As his physique developed so did his rebellious behaviour, but his arms were drawn when he found solace with his guidance counsellor.

"Anyone can hit, a baby can hit, but [he taught me] you should use your mouth and brain and use cognitive thinking," Rotchild says. "It's what makes us different than animals, and this really got into my head and it's when I fell in love with psychology."

'I'm doing this for me and no one else'

The 35-year-old social worker is now somewhat of a guidance counsellor himself, leading disgruntled children away from bullying.

Rotchild's experiences being a social outcast and a punching bag have helped him relate to the kids and to come up with efficient anger management tools.

At four years old, Rotchild's Israeli parents packed up their home in Canada and moved back to Israel, hoping for a prosperous life with family and loved ones on their native soil. But economic hardship put a strain on his family, and they returned to Toronto six years later. Rotchild barely spoke a word of English on his return.

"People asked me on the first day of school, if I was born in Canada why couldn't I speak English. They were ignorant kids and I was bullied and teased because I couldn't speak the language, and I experienced racism in school for being Jewish," he recalls.

'Once someone's getting bullied, the victim becomes the bully'

"I became an angry teen and once someone's getting bullied, the victim becomes the bully."

Rotchild encourages the children he counsels to gain self-discipline, which he has lots of. He's been dedicated to improving his physique for more than 20 years through a strict diet and workout regime. Initially, he started body building so that he could intimidate others; now, it is a mantra of healthy living for him and a way of connecting mind, body and spirit.

Rotchild, a former body builder champion in the FAME World Championship and PRO Showdown competitions, which are high-profile drug-free fitness events, says his career in body building is about achieving personal goals and creating higher ones to reach in the future.

"A lot of people, including my co-workers, who are psychologists and psychiatrists, look at me like I'm really into myself, but I really try to come across that there's more to me than body building," he says.

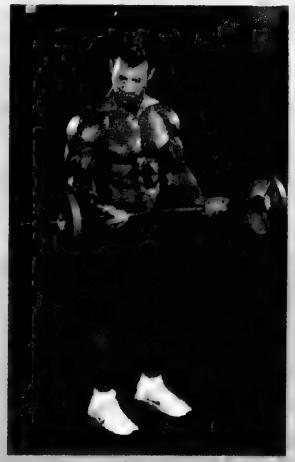
"Everyone's different and there are some people who are self-absorbed. Before, for me, it was about narcissism, but now it's not. It's about goals."

To keep in top condition, Rotchild hits the gym six days a week, twice a day, and focuses on weight lifting and cardio. He keeps to a strict, balanced diet of carbohydrates and proteins, and eats multiple meals a day.

"I always have a big lunch bag, and I get teased a lot by my co-workers. They say, 'He never leaves home without a picnic!' Whenever I open up my food containers, I have to warn people [about the smells] and I get ridiculed a bit, but I'm doing this for me and no one else."

A lot of pressure comes with body building and participating in fitness competitions. Rotchild says it puts a strain on the body and the mind. The pressure to beat personal goals echoes through his head like a constant drumbeat.

This year's FAME championship and showdown takes place at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre from June 13 to 15, but Rotchild won't be attending.



Jeff Kippel, co-president of FAME, says that because Rotchild's tests came back positive for steroid use, he won't be able to compete in this year's event.

"The guidelines [for FAME] are to be natural and healthy, which means not using substances," Kippel says.

But Rotchild say FAME's allegations are untrue and argues the organization is jumping to conclusions before listening to what he has to say.

"Sometime when there are all kinds of supplementations and vitamins that people take over the counter, [others] jump to conclusions. I was not taking steroids or illegal substances," he says.

Despite this challenge, Rotchild says he will persevere and overcome it in the same way he's prevailed over the obstacles he tackled in his youth. He's determined to clear his name and move on by entering other body-building competitions.

"Everything in life we have to work for. We have to work hard for what we want, and if things came easy we wouldn't appreciate it. I work very hard to get to where I am and I'm proud," Rotchild says.

The Canadian student who was Sharon's and Olmert's speechwriter

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"This is the story of a typical 20-something New Yorker who accidentally stumbled into the nerve centre of the Israeli government, and an account of all that I saw along the way before realizing that I really had no business being there."

This bracingly candid paragraph succinctly sums up Gregory Levey's comical memoir, Shut Up, I'm Talking And Other Diplomacy Lessons I learned in the Israeli Government (Free Press).

Gregory Levey

Levey, in fact a Torontonian, wrote speeches for Israel's United Nations mission in New York City and served as a speechwriter for two successive prime ministers, Ariel Sharon and Ehud Olmert. Currently on the faculty of Ryerson University in Toronto, he was an employee of the Israeli government for 2½ years, until Olmert succeeded his incapacitated predecessor in January 2006. Levey describes his brief career as "sometimes rocky" and "always very strange."

The book, by turns sardonic and funny, exposes ineptitude, and skewers foibles and inappropriate behaviour. In an author's note, he observes: "Israelis frequently deal with their difficult situation by laughing about the absurdity that surrounds them. There is no reason outsiders should not do the same. Sometimes it is in the comic details that best reflect the gravity of the larger picture"

A graduate of Bialik Hebrew Day School, he took his position during his second year of law school, when he badly needed a break from boredom and tedium. He originally considered joining the Israeli army, signing up online for a program designed for foreign volunteers. In the meantime, though, he applied for an internship at Israel's UN mission to help pass the time until his departure date.

An atheist who grew up in a somewhat observant family from South Africa, he soon learned that internships were not actually available. Much to his surprise, however, the deputy ambassador, Arye Mekel, now the foreign ministry's spokesman, hired him.

The tone of Shut Up, I'm Talking is established in the foreword. As a result of a bizarre series of events, Levey, then 25 and not even an Israeli citizen, found himself representing Israel at the UN assembly minutes before a vote was to be taken on a resolution. He neither knew what it was about nor how he should cast his ballot. If nothing else, the incident left an indelible impression: "It continually astounded me that things were done in such a haphazard fashion in the Israeli government."

Returning to this theme, he says, "Nothing was ever really planned out ahead of time, even when it was clear that other countries were working on their speeches weeks in advance."

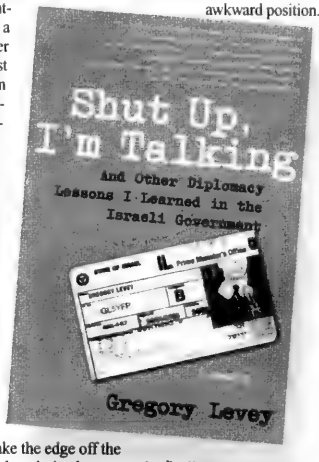
Levey's pen portraits of the rather eccentric staff at the Israeli mission may seem damning. At his first official meeting with Mekel, he expected a serious discussion of the situation in the Middle East and at the United Nations and an explanation of his responsibilities. What he got instead was "an incredibly dirty joke" from Mekel, who had a habit of contorting his legs into incredibly improbable positions.

Levey eventually discovered that a few of his colleagues resorted to comic relief to take the edge off the pressure at the United Nations. After awhile, he admits, he emulated them.

Thanks to Mekel, he acquired a knowledge of doublespeak. "When a diplomat says yes," he told Levey, "it means maybe. When a diplomat says maybe, it means no." And if a diplomat says no, he should not be a diplomat, period.

Usually, Levey was called upon to compose straightforward speeches on current events. But in one odd instance, he had to write a speech refuting an accusation that Israel's occupation of the territories was causing acne among Palestinian teenagers.

On at least one occasion, Levey was almost thrust into an unpalatable situation. When PLO leader Yasser Arafat died, the United Nations decided to honour him, placing Israel in an awkward position. Israel viewed Arafat as a terrorist and was inclined to boycott the event. On the other hand, Israel did not want to snub the UN. Levey was delegated to represent Israel, a task he resented. He was greatly relieved by Israel's decision not to send anyone.



In another case, Mekel informed a group of diplomats from Canada that Levey was a Canadian. "They both looked at me, confused and scrunching their brows." When Levey said he was not an Israeli and informed the Canadians that they represented him at the UN, they were utterly perplexed.

Levey pokes fun at Silvan Shalom, who was then Israeli foreign minister. Levey was told that he could not handle sentences more than six words long. Later, he learned that Shalom was challenged by the simplest monosyllabic word. When he finally met Shalom, he was wearing only his underwear. Shalom continued to wear this as he conferred with Israel's ambassador to the UN, Danny Gillerman, and the director general of Israel's foreign ministry, Ron Prosser.

Levey usually agreed with Israeli policy, but in his book he lays out dissenting views. He disagrees with Israel's murder of high-ranking Hamas leaders, saying that targeted assassinations "fan the flames of animosity." He also believes that the route of the security barrier should follow the old Green Line rather than jut into the West Bank.

Levey became a speechwriter for Sharon after one of his aides asked for a speech. He was shocked when Sharon delivered it nearly as it had been written. When Levey was subsequently offered a job in Sharon's office in Jerusalem, he considered rejecting it because his girlfriend and wife-to-be, a student, was not enthusiastic about the idea.

Having decided to accept what could be the chance of a lifetime, Levey told Gillerman he was leaving New York. Gillerman's response was couched in black humour: "You know, I can get you the name of a good psychiatrist."

Levey got little face time with Sharon, whom he refers to "an invincible force of nature." Levey's boss, Ra'anan Gissin, a loud, frantic individual partial to Abba, the Swedish pop band, once swore at a pedestrian while conducting an interview with CNN in his car. And Gissin conspicuously clipped his nails while hosting an American delegation.

Yet Gissin was hardly the strangest character Levey encountered. He assigns that dubious honour to a particularly disgusting fellow who was in charge of dispensing cellphones. He mocked the way Levey spoke and spat the shells of sunflower seeds directly into his face.

By that juncture, Levey knew that his days in Israel were numbered. In the aftermath of Sharon's massive stroke, Levey wrote short speeches for Olmert, but Olmert, a good English speaker, rarely used them. However, after giving Gissin notice that he was leaving, he was asked to write Olmert's speech for his first trip abroad. "Only a smattering of my first draft remained recognizable in the final version, but I was flattered to hear that some of my lines had stayed in because [Olmert] had liked them."

Shortly afterward, Levey and his girlfriend left Israel. When he arrived in the United States, he virtually let out a sigh. "When our plane touched down at JFK Airport, it felt like I had finally come home."

Despite the close connections he had forged with Israel, he had no intention of becoming an Israeli.

Steel Toes – a strong film about racism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

David Gow's strong feature film, Steel Toes, which opens in Toronto on May 16, will definitely not leave viewers indifferent.

The tough-minded story of a Montreal neo-Nazi skinhead who goes on trial for killing an East Indian immigrant, Steel Toes stars David Strathairn as Danny Dunkelman, the court-appointed Jewish lawyer who defends him, and Andrew Walker as Mike Downey, the despicable but intelligent racist.

Written and directed by Gow, it opens with a bang as Downey attacks a hapless Indian restaurant worker who has accidentally spilled a liquid substance on him.

The scene shifts to a detached house, where Dunkelman is readying himself for a new day, and then to a cell where Downey is being held.

"Do you know what kind of a name Dunkelman is?" the lawyer asks provocatively. "It's not Irish," Downey sarcastically retorts. Gow thus sets the mood of a contentious relationship.

Steel Toes – which refers to the black boots Downey used to pummel his victim to death – is a spare film with basically only two characters, Dunkelman and Downey. As a character study, it is corrosively good.

Polar opposites, they continually joust. "I don't like skinheads or neo-Nazis," Dunkelman declares. "I don't expect you to like me," replies Downey, Subsequently, Downey observes that Dunkelman does not "look" Jewish and refers disparagingly to ethnic Indians as "sand niggers."

Surprisingly, perhaps, Dunkelman agrees to represent him. He considers his case a challenge. Though pleased by his decision, Downey admits that, in "an ideal world," he would have Dunkelman "eliminated."

Andrew Walker and David Strathairn in Steel Toes

Warning Downey that he faces a long sentence if convicted, Dunkelman convinces him to construct his own defence. Downey, however, can hardly concentrate on the task at hand. Hemmed in by prison walls, he rants, raves and moans as he paces the floor furiously.

Meanwhile, back at the Dunkelman residence, a friend berates him for defending a neo-Nazi.

As the film builds to a climax and Dunkelman instructs his client on how best to conduct himself in court, he and Downey engage in further verbal fisticuffs. Dunkelman describes him as "white trash," while Downey brands Jews as the "spawn of Satan" and talks menacingly about the "Zionist occupation government."

Downey softens after listening to the pained oral deposition of his victim, who died after the beating. He now realizes the error of his ways, recants and disavows his unsavoury past. This begs the question whether Downey's remorse and volte face are genuine or merely a conversion of convenience?

Wisely, Steel Toes, distinguished by fine acting and razor sharp dialogue, leaves that conundrum to our imagination.

Inside Out movie/video festival features two Israeli films

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Inside Out, the Toronto Lesbian and Gay Film and Video Festival that runs from May 15 to 25, has two Israeli films on its program this year.

The Secrets, by Avi Nesher, largely takes place in a secluded women's seminary in Israel and touches on a sometimes erotic relationship between two students. It will be screened on May 18 at 9:45 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Japan Japan, a film by Lior Shamriz scheduled for May 16 at 10 p.m. at Cinecycle, is about an isolated young man searching for life's meaning.

Nesher's two-hour film, beautifully composed and performed, is mainly set in a midrashah in Safed, high in the forested mountains of the Galilee.

Naomi Hess' dearly beloved mother has just died, yet even amid the grief, she comes under pressure from her father – a respected rabbi who heads a yeshiva in the Orthodox enclave of Bnei Brak – to settle down and marry Michael, his glum protege.Naomi (Ania Bokstein), a pretty young thing well schooled in Talmud and Kabbalah, marches to a different drummer. Turned off by Michael, a straight-laced, humourless man who views women through the prism of domestic servitude, she wants to postpone the wedding, study at a seminary, and hopefully, pursue her secret ambition of becoming a rabbi.

Having won her father's approval to continue her religious studies, she finds herself at the Knowledge and Truth Seminary, where she meets Michelle (Michal Shtamler), a feisty, spoiled, strong-willed person from France who was born in Israel.

Michelle leaves a poor impression on her peers, but she and Naomi form a close and abiding bond after they are assigned to visit and feed a dying middle-aged French visitor, Anouk Kessner (the French actress Fanny Ardant), who lives across from the midrashah.

As these events converge, Nesher draws a plausible portrait of the austere seminary, where personal animosities and a commitment to excellence in scholarship coexist uneasily.

In a film brimming with sub-plots, one of the most affecting ones concerns Michelle's growing romantic attraction to Yanki, an Orthodox klezmer clarinetist who works as a pharmacist by day. Yanki's boyish charm, modesty and down-to-earth qualities make him a far better catch than Michael, the stiff, sober scholar promised to Naomi.

Rather than marrying him, Naomi is drawn to Michelle. In a tender scene, they find themselves at a sleepover. Affectionate touching turns to passionate necking, and exchanges of kisses on the lips signify that they have passed into the uncharted waters of lesbianism.

Tapping into her formidable erudition, Naomi informs Michelle that there is no biblical injunction against sex between women. Naomi proclaims her desire to live in domestic bliss with Michelle, but much to her disappointment, Michelle is as straight as an arrow. "I want a normal family," she says, referring to her growing attachment to Yanki. Naomi retorts, "Am I not normal?"

Nesher, a skillful director, handles these situations with sensitivity and finesse, and The Secrets morphs into a love story with a definite twist.

It stands head and shoulders above Japan Japan, a low-budget, sexually explicit movie about an aimless 19-year-old Israeli who fetishizes Japan.

Imri, who is gay, uses his passion for Japan as a kind of search engine for self-examination. But at the end of the day, he is confused. "I don't know what to do with my life," he laments in a searing moment of truth.

Unfortunately, a spirit of drift informs Japan Japan, which is improvisational, fragmentary, experimental, self-indulgent and, finally, weird.

WINNIPEG AUTHOR ALLAN LEVINE LAUNCHES NEW MYSTERY SERIES SET IN NEW YORK CITY IN 1870s

Winnipeg historian-author Allan Levine has taken a year off his teaching job to work on various impressive literary projects. After writing a trilogy of books about his Winnipeg-based Jewish immigrant detective Sam Klein, he has penned the first in what he hopes will be a series of mystery books set in New York in 1871 and featuring a journalist as the protagonist. The title is Evil of the Age: The Charles St. Clair Chronicles.

"In the sizzling summer of 1871, New Yorkers talk about only two things: a murdered woman cruelly stuffed into a trunk and Tammany Hall's insidious corruption," reads a promotional blurb. "Journalist Charles St. Clair travels from the mansions of Fifth Avenue to the brothels of SoHo on the trail of both stories. But what he uncovers proves to be more shocking than even he ever imagined."

One hopes that, with New York as a backdrop instead of Winnipeg, the book will appeal to a much larger readership south of the border. It is being launched in Winnipeg on May 14; Levine also appears in Toronto at Bloody Words, the mystery book convention, June 5 to 8.

Meanwhile, he's preparing an introduction for a new edition of his award-winning non-fiction work Fugitives of the Forest: The Heroic Story of Jewish Resistance and Survival During the Second World War, which was first published a decade ago. Its reappearance is likely to coincide with the release of Defiance, a major motion picture from Paramount/Vintage about the Jewish partisans, including some in Toronto and Winnipeg.

Other projects on his desk include Coming of Age: A History of the Jews of Manitoba, a book commissioned by the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada and slated for publication next year. Additionally, he did extensive research, including interviews in Canada, Europe and Israel, for Peter C. Newman, who is writing a biography of Izzy Asper, expected out in the fall.

For a new Holocaust book project, he would like to interview survivors whose skills as tailors, electricians, metal workers, etc., helped them survive in ghetto factories or labour camps. Please contact him by e-mail, Alevine@sjr.mb.ca or by telephone, 204-831-9695. His website is www.allanlevinebooks.com.

Toronto Jewish Folk Choir: The 82nd annual spring concert of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir features the lively work Oifn Fidl (On the Fiddle) by composer Vladimir Heifetz, based on a Sholem Aleichem short story about a boy's passion for the violin. The performance features David Weiss as baritone soloist, clarinettist Alexander Fedorovsky, and four teenage musicians – violinists Lyrit Milgram and Eitan Postavsky, cellist Hannah Belvedere and flautist Chris James.

Presented in celebration of Israel's 60th anniversary, the concert offers a mélange of evocative Hebrew tunes as well as Adio Querida, a Sephardi song in Judeo-Spanish. The orchestration is by Alexander Veprinsky, who has arranged a Yiddish tango and some Yiddish favourites for the 30-voice choir. An operatic chorus and French folksong complete the program, which also features an instrumental ensemble, pianist Lina Zemelman, soprano Miriam Eskin, tenor Artour Razgoev and bass Herman Rombouts. $23, $19; children 12 and under, free. Successful Toronto-born actor takes on producing

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

She has graced the screen in the cult classic movie Napoleon Dynamite. Received a Gemini award for her role in the immensely popular supernatural TV drama The Collector. Is venturing into a new, real-life role as a producer. And is a spokesperson for the venerable Make-A-Wish Foundation.

Yet in spite of a host of successes that would give most of us swelled egos, Ellen Dubin appreciates it all and definitely remembers who helped her along the way.

"I never forget who gave me my first jobs," the attractive, Toronto-born actor-producer says.

"I always love coming back and doing repeat business for those producers."

To that end, Dubin just wrapped up a movie role for A Teacher's Crime, a film that will air on the Lifetime Network. It was produced by the same producer who gave her the very first role she played in a movie.

Ellen Dubin

In addition to A Teacher's Crime, Dubin recently completed her first gig as a producer for a movie called Lost and Found, now in post-production. And she also lent her voice as a narrator for a series of sci-fi/fantasy books.

"The character I played spoke so low and gravelly, I had to drink warm water and honey in between recordings," she says.

Dubin is funny and vivacious, and quite comfortably reveals these gifts on the big and little screen. Although she often appears in dramas, she has a knack for injecting humour into her roles.

"Like life, nothing is black and white in acting – no character is entirely serious or funny," says Dubin, who has also appeared in such shows and films as Lexx, Highlander: The Raven, Dead Zone and A Wrinkle in Time.

In a drama, she finds the lighter moments, "so when the heavy dramatic section occurs, you can surprise the audience and take them in a different direction," she says.

It was, in fact, a ballet teacher who helped take Dubin in the direction of acting.

She was a shy kid, and her father, Carl, and her mother, Rose, who incidentally was a director of the Leah Posluns Theatre school, enrolled their daughter in a ballet class to help her come out of her shell.

The ballet teacher was tough as nails, but also had a keen eye for talent and after seeing Dubin showcase comedic antics on stage, suggested that acting was in the cards.

"She told me that I had the ability to move an audience to tears and also make them laugh," Dubin says.

So she began acting in school, did small-town theatre, summer stock and paid her dues.

"I always tried to keep studying and learning new things – singing, improv, comedy – [and then] taking the leap and moving to the United States to really learn the business of acting," she says.

"I never think of myself as well-known. I just want to work, and I think if you have that frame of mind, it is a better way to focus on a career in acting."

So what's next for the nearly six-foot-tall thespian?

The film she produced will be entered into festivals and is slated to air on Bravo.

Other films, including Abducted, The Perfect Neighbour and The Wives He Forgot, can be seen on the Movie Network. And when she isn't acting or producing, quality time with her husband, Jay Switzer, the former president of CHUM Television and a well-known media consultant, is cherished.

Wherever she is and whatever she is doing, you can be sure Dubin and the team working with her will be laughing together.

ORDER IN DISORDER: Montreal Gazette journalist/author Josh Freed, seen here in his shockingly disorganized office, is a self-confessed mess. He claims, however, that his best work is born from the chaos. In the humorous, new, one-hour CTV documentary My Messy Life (May 17, 7 p.m), Freed defends his clutter and gets to the bottom of the battle between the chaotic and the neat in an attempt to prove that a messy desk does not equal a messy mind. In the film, Freed meets Canada's former justice minister Irwin Cotler, who explains that his busy desk reflects his busy mind – and why his passion for paper reflects his passion for justice. Then, Freed visits renowned Internet guru Esther Dyson, the notoriously messy cyber-superstar and author who argues that tidying up is an inefficient waste of time and that her mess is in fact the secret to her success. Freed, an award-winning author, playwright and journalist, has won two National Newspaper Awards as best Canadian columnist for his weekly column in the Gazette and has received the Stephen Leacock Memorial Medal for Humour.

ISRAEL LOOKS AT BARRING CARS FROM JERUSALEM'S OLD CITY

Two Israeli government ministries are studying the pros and cons of turning the Old City of Jerusalem into a pedestrian zone, largely free of the vehicular traffic that often clogs its streets.

The directors of the tourism and transportation ministries established a joint committee in April to examine the roads system and limited parking facilities within the Old City. The move was prompted by the increasing number of tourists and visitors in the area, and tourist-related vehicles that are parked illegally, blocking traffic.

"The movement of private and public vehicles inside the Old City constitutes a serious nuisance… and significantly damages the touring experience," said Tourism Minister Shaul Tzemach.

The ministries are working with the municipality to find permanent solutions to the traffic chaos, which may require lower fees in surrounding parking lots, safe passenger drop-off lanes for tourists, the broadening of existing traffic routes and the addition of alternative routes into the Old City.

In a separate development, the tourism ministry recently approved a 90-million NIS (about $26 million) investment in nearly a dozen tourism projects in and around Jerusalem. The funds have been earmarked for building new hotel rooms, adding new hotel rooms to existing hotels and upgrading rooms. Funds have also been allocated for hotel expansion around the country.

According to Tzemach, Israel is preparing to welcome some five million tourists and business travellers to the country by 2010. "We must be prepared to offer an attractive tourism answer to these visitors [because]… there will be significant competition from Turkey, Egypt, Cyprus and other countries in the region," he said.

North York youngster tops in Canadian Under-13 squash

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

He's the highest ranked squash player in Canada for kids under 13, but Jake Beck has a sort of ho-hum attitude to the sport he dominates.

To maintain his interest, he plays up, competing in tournaments against youngsters in the Under-15 grouping. But even with the added challenge, he sometimes feels he'd rather be doing something else.

"I was pretty unenthusiastic this year, but the years before I was enthusiastic," Beck, 12, said on the phone from his home in North York.

Other sports, particularly soccer, interest him more than squash these days, though during the squash season, which has pretty much wound up until September, he was able to maintain his concentration.

At the Canadian Junior Championship last month, he fell behind in the best-of-five final two games to nothing and trailed in the third, 7-3, before turning the match around. He won the third game 10-9 and then went on to dominate games four and five to win the title, 3-2.

"I usually beat him badly," Beck said of his championship match opponent.

So what happened in the final?

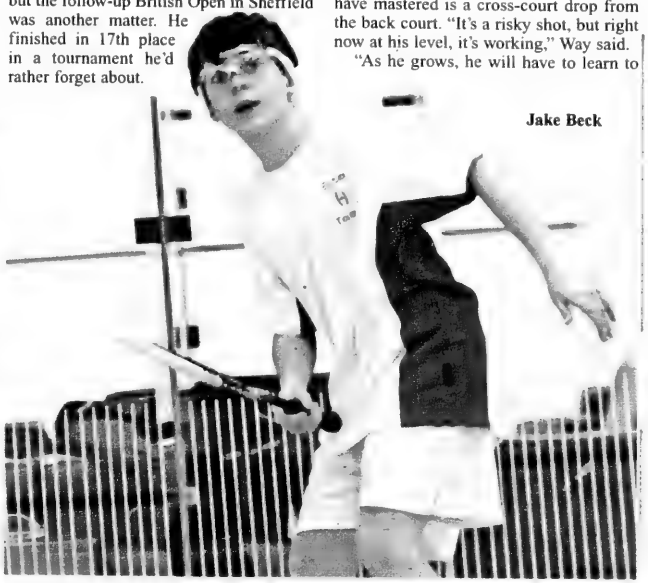
"I just woke up when I was down two. I underestimated him."

Playing close matches is a talent Beck seems to be cultivating. It's what his father, Harvey, calls "a parent heart-stopper."

In December, Jake advanced to the finals of the Canadian Junior Open and fell behind 2-0 in games to an opponent from Mexico. Game 5 went right down to the wire, but it was a match Jake couldn't pull out. He lost 9-7 in Game 5 and 3-2 overall.

A year before at the 2007 Canadian Junior Championship – Jake's first year in the age group – he lost in the final 3-2. Game 5 was decided in extra points, 10-9. For the drama value alone, Beck's games should be on TSN.

He had an easier time of it last December when he travelled to Edinburgh for the Scottish Junior Open for boys under 13. He won that tournament rather easily, but the follow-up British Open in Sheffield was another matter. He finished in 17th place in a tournament he'd rather forget about.



Jake Beck

"I could have done better," he said.

Beck has been playing recreational squash since he was six and competitively for the last three years. Harvey is a recreational player and older brother, Aaron, 14, is ranked third in Ontario in the under-15 category.

Jake calls himself a natural athlete who loves to compete. On the squash court, "I rely on speed and stamina, and on my hands for drop shots and fake shots."

One of his coaches, Mike Way, calls Jake "an independent spirit who marches to his own drumbeat.

"He's first of all a great little athlete, so he's fit and he's fast. Coupled with that, he's very determined. He's the most creative squash player, so he does things Jake's way. He doesn't always do things the coach's way."

One unorthodox shot Jake seems to have mastered is a cross-court drop from the back court. "It's a risky shot, but right now at his level, it's working," Way said.

"As he grows, he will have to learn to be a more disciplined player, but that creativity will serve him well. But he's going to have to make those choices wiser and make creativity work for him."

As the summer looms ahead, Jake is turning his attention to the other sports he enjoys. He's a midfielder and back up goalie for North York Cosmos rep team, and he's on his school's track and field and cross-country teams. Oh, and he's also played for the school's badminton and tennis teams.

Jake attends St. Andrews Junior High School as part of its program for high-performing athletes.

"I'm a really good natural athlete," he said. "I'm able to learn. I'm not a crazy-hard worker. It's mostly my natural athleticism."

Given that he trains six days a week during the squash season (September to April) and nine times a week before big tournaments, it looks like he's got a different definition of hard work than most.

With all that training and natural talent, his goal to compete in the Canada Games when he's 16 appears well within reach.

Doing it all for love

Recently, I had lunch with a former colleague who had moved on from journalism into public relations.

She was tanned and relaxed, even though it was a Wednesday night. She was telling me about her upcoming vacation – her third this year.

"I'm telling you Sand," she said. "As soon as I quit journalism, I realized I was in for a lifestyle change."

It wasn't the first time I had contemplated abandoning my career choice. But each time, I decided to stick to what I love instead of opting for this "lifestyle" that everyone keeps talking about. But now I can't help but wonder if it's time to stop the romanticism and finally try some of that rationalism that always seems to escape me when it comes to matters of the heart.

Yes, heart. Because I truly believe we should be in love with our jobs, considering that our work is how and where we spend practically half of our lives.

But even when you're in love, sometimes you just can't help but look around and wonder what might have been, had you chosen a different path.

Take my friend Samantha, for example. She's the quintessential corporate type who relishes power suits, thrives on PowerPoint presentations and owns the corporate ladder. She's going to be a CEO one day, she says, and I have no doubt about it.

However, even she has started to express some second thoughts about her career path. She's got other loves, other passions, that she wants to – needs to – explore before settling down with just one.

For example, she's an accomplished and talented dancer. Should she pursue that dream while she's still young enough to do it?

When I was 25, I wrote about the frustrations of starting a career. I figured that by 27, I would have figured it all out. Mostly I have, but there are days when I wonder exactly what it is that I know for certain, and the answer is, "Not a damn thing."

I also thought this career backtracking was unique to those of us suffering from quarter-life crises, but lately I've come to realize that it's a struggle we all go through ever few years, no matter what business we're in.

I read somewhere that the average person changes careers about three times in their lifetime. I wonder how many of those changes take place while the person is in their twenties?

I once had a teacher who I greatly admired for having a wonderful job in the industry while raising two little ones at home.

"How do you do it?" I asked her one day.

She, too, used the analogy of love and said that once she had her children, it was easy to give up part of her first love for her real loves – her kids.

"But you never forget your first love," she said. "You just have to find a way to make it all work for you."

When it comes to a career, I guess it doesn't matter if you're contemplating giving it up for kids, or giving it up for an easier lifestyle.

All that matters is that you don't give it up for something that you'll always love less.

GREEN BEAN AND HAZELNUT SALAD

- 2 tbl hazelnuts
- 1-1/2 tsp balsamic vinegar
- 4 tsp extra-virgin olive oil
- 1/4 c finely chopped red onion
- 3/4 lb green beans, trimmed and halved diagonally
- 2-1/4 tsp grainy mustard
- 1/8 tsp sea salt
- 1 tblsp flaxseed oil
- 1 tsp hazelnut oil

Preheat oven to 325°F. Toast nuts in small baking pan 15-20 minutes (cut one open to test for doneness). Cool, then rub off any loose skins in a paper towel. Coarsely chop nuts.

Cook beans in pot of boiling salted water until just tender (4-6 min.). Rinse with cold water to stop cooking. Drain well.

In a bowl, whisk together mustard, vinegar, sea salt; whisk in olive, flaxseed, and hazelnut oils. Add beans, nuts, and onion and toss well. Season with salt and pepper.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I am a mother of two boys and have seen what bullying can do, but I always thought it was something that kids eventually outgrow.

But recently I attended a simchah where I was seated at a table with a man who used threats, intimidation and manipulation to control everyone, from his wife and kids to the wait staff and other guests. He even bullied me out of my seat so he could have a better view of the dance floor. At first I thought he was just a jerk, but by the end of the evening, I realized that this guy is an adult bully.

My friend who made the simchah later informed me that she is friends with his wife and has often witnessed his inappropriate bullying of his own family. I was quiet for most of the night, but now I wish I would have spoken out. How do you handle an adult bully?

Obnoxious Bully

Dear Obnoxious Bully

There is no question that adult bullies exist, and they make people whose lives they touch miserable. A bully is someone who tries to gain control by making others feel angry or afraid. It is often a subconscious method used by people with emotional problems, such as low self esteem, anger and poor social skills. It makes them feel powerful and is really a tactic to mask their own insecurities.

How does one handle an adult bully? The same way you would handle a child bully. You stand up to them. You could start by ignoring their behaviour, but that's not always possible. In your case, you get to just walk away, but his wife, kids, business associates, friends, etc., aren't so lucky.

You need an equally strong personality to deal with a bully. You must stand your ground without provoking him. You need to address his remarks confidently and firmly without emotion. Do not let him upset you, or he has won his measure of control. If he can't bully you, he will change the subject or move on. If you remember that this is his problem, not yours, you will have more success at not letting his hurtful words penetrate you.

Chances are you won't change a bully's behaviour, but you can change how he treats you. If he can't bully you, he will back down or abandon the relationship. You can handle the situation with a controlled reaction.

An ode to accountants

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Accountants get a lot of bad press, and they're often the butt of jokes, such as this anonymous zinger: "An accountant is a man who watches the battle from the safety of the hills and then comes down to bayonet the wounded."

Accounting season has just wrapped up, and instead of ridiculing them, I think we should pay homage to the hard-working men and women whom we visit at least once a year to complete our tax returns, as well as share some of our most intimate and personal information.

Let me tell you a little bit about my experiences with my accountants.

David Rosenzweig, my brother-in-law (may he rest in peace) and original accountant, was a fine man and an excellent professional.

Once a year, I would head over to David's office, generally on the Sunday morning before the April 30 filing deadline, feeling groggy and irritated about the task at hand. His office was abuzz with activity, and he would meet me in the reception area with a smile and tired, but joyful, eyes.

David would shift his coffee mug from one hand to the other and shake my hand, and then we would then make the short jaunt to his office, past the coffee room and some very tired-looking accountants.

There I was greeted by stacks of files, returns being prepared to mail off to Ottawa.

I remember wondering about the financial situation of his other clients. How much were they worth? Who was experiencing great business success and who was suffering (because somebody always was)? Did I have as many charitable receipts as the other files he was working on? Did I choose the correct profession? The other files seemed so much thicker than mine.

Throughout our 60 minutes together, as David unfolded and collated my T4s and gas receipts, I always felt as though I was David's only client, and I sensed that he, too, looked forward to our time together. From stories I heard later, most of his clients felt the same way.

It was understood that while we were meeting, everyone else was to stay out of the office. After all, our conversation was very private. It had to do with money, and I'm Canadian. Nobody needs to know.

And while we talked dollars and cents, David would always ask, in a most sincere way, how things were going in my life.

He would tell me how he enjoyed the Marty & Avrum (my radio show) shiva food review he had heard that morning on the way to work. He would laugh heartily at the silliness of it. He would then respectfully probe a little deeper, asking poignant questions about familial issues and the ways to solve them.

This was our – David's and mine – annual one-hour meeting, when we would fulfil the obligations set out by the Canada Revenue Agency.

I looked forward to it. It was enjoyable and unique, and, in those days, I generally got money back.

I miss my original accountant and our annual hour together. I am fortunate, however, because today my accountant is Stephen Altbaum, a very decent and talented man, with a warm soul and deep sense of concern for the Jewish people. He also knows his way around numbers.

David Letterman once said, "There's no business like show business, but there are several businesses like accounting." That may be, but there aren't a lot of people around like the women and men we spend some of our most private moments with, discussing our financial lives and the secret stuff about our existence that few are privy to.

God bless our accountants. What would a good battle be without them?

What you've always wanted to ask home buying professionals

By MICHAEL ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Buying a home is perhaps the biggest and most important purchase you will ever make. It requires a lot of planning, research and smart investment decisions. Here are some pointers from home buying industry professionals.

CJN: How does Toronto's market for carriage trade homes compare with other high-end markets in large cities?

Elise Kalles of Harvey Kalles Real Estate Ltd.: When you compare Toronto to New York, London and Hong Kong, for example, Toronto's high-end market... is very favourable. Toronto has high-end exclusive homes that are single-family detached homes, very close to the downtown core. This is unique... None of the other cities boast homes that are detached, where you have room for tennis courts, pools etc., and you can be downtown in less than 10 minutes.

Elise Kalles of Harvey Kalles Real Estate Ltd: The people who are buying these luxury homes are Canadians who range in age from 40 to70. Also, foreign investors are buying many condominium units as investments. [In fact], Toronto sold more condominium units in 2007 than Manhattan

CJN: What are the up and coming areas in cottage country?

Bernice Whelan of Bernice Whelan Realty: The areas that are gaining popularity are in and around Barrie and Keswick. Both sides of the lake have prime locations for cottages.

CJN: Is the trend for people to buy cottages or rent?

Bernice Whelan of Bernice Whelan Realty: Definitely buying. People are buying cottages both as an investment and for full use of them. It is a summer home for them to take their families to, and in the winter, they also spend lots of time there, as do their children and grandchildren.

CJN: What would you say to prospective buyers about why cottages are good investments?

Sandra Roth of Rybak Realty Inc: An investment is measured by its return. An investment in a cottage is not just a financial investment – it is also an investment in family and... in your own personal well-being.

Your summers on the lake [and] winters on the frozen lake become shared memories of quality time spent together with family and friends, creating bonds that would otherwise be unknown. Swimming, boating, biking, walking, reading, chatting, playing in the unpolluted air – what could be better for your physical and mental health?

Unlike subdivisions, more lakefront property is not being created, so few cottagers sell their property for the price they paid for it. That is a sure sign of a good investment.

CJN: Who are the most common buyers of high-end condominiums in the mid-downtown area of Toronto?

Elli Davis of Royal LePage Real Estate Services Ltd. Brokerage: While all kinds of people are buying these condos, many are in the 50-plus group – empty nesters who want to scale down and are trading their homes for condos. There are also younger people, such as single men and women, as well as couples, who tend to purchase these condos in the mid-price range.

CJN: Do condos need to be inspected?

Elli Davis of Royal LePage Real Estate Services Ltd. Brokerage: In general, people do not have condos inspected. However, I think it's a good idea to go through the new ones in particular and make sure everything is finished to your satisfaction.

CJN: Discuss the kinds of amenities offered in high-end condos and what is their average size?

Elli Davis of Royal LePage Real Estate Services Ltd. Brokerage: Most of these condos have such features as swimming pools, a doorman and exercise rooms. They also have underground parking, a sauna, party facilities and a hobby room. The average size of them is 1,500 to 2,000 square feet, but at the very high end, some can go up to 4,000 square feet.

CJN: Who is generally buying condos in the north end of the city?

Ted Waxman of Alan Newton Real Estate Ltd.: A lot of the people purchasing condos in the north end are older people who no longer want to look after a house. There are also many young people who are trying to get into the market.

CJN: To what extent are condos starter homes for many people?

Ted Waxman of Alan Newton Real Estate Ltd: Many people who are first-time buyers are trying to get into the market, because they realize real estate is a good investment, so they buy a condo. Depending on the market, they will likely stay in the condo for anywhere from one to three years.

What you've always wanted to ask home buying professionals

CJN: What is the average size of these condos in the north end and what amenities do they typically include?

Ted Waxman of Alan Newton Real Estate Ltd: It depends on the area of the city. For example, the new condos near Yonge and Sheppard are 600 to 700 square feet for a one-bedroom. Farther north, along Steeles near Bathurst, as well as the Promenade condos, you will find more two-bedroom suites in the 1,100- to 1,200-square-feet range.

The main amenities people are looking for in these areas are a swimming pool, workout room and sauna.

CJN: How common is it for people to buy a condo and rent it out?

Ted Waxman of Alan Newton Real Estate Ltd.: Right now, this is not common. Maintenance fees go up every year and so have the prices of condos, which makes it less attractive to rent out. What people are doing is buying condos off of the blueprints, waiting for them to get registered and then a few years later, flipping them.

David Eichorn of David Eichorn Realty Limited: The most important feature for a young Orthodox family in their search for a home is proximity to synagogues, day schools, shopping, and other Orthodox Jewish families. They are looking to be ideally situated in the heart of an established Orthodox community whose members share the same beliefs, lifestyle and values.

With regard to the actual design of the home, their needs are rather specific. The kitchen, being the focal point, requires generous space to allow for the separation of dairy and meat. Ideally, it should be large enough to permit family dining. Space and budget permitting, it would also include two separate ovens, stoves, sinks, dishwashers and counters. The cabinetry must be sufficient to allow for four sets of dishes.

Family sizes are generally larger, requiring more bedrooms and bathrooms. The dining room should preferably be combined with the living room to allow for comfortable, formal family meals. Being the people of the book, the family's wish list would include a main-floor library for the husband.

CJN: Why would people in search of a mortgage want to enlist the services of a mortgage broker?

Guy Scheiner of Venture Financial Ltd: Mortgages are not simple, and it is difficult for people to be educated about all the details. That is what a broker or mortgage consultant can help with. From day one, we sit with the client, explain everything to them and let them know about the different products and institutions available to them. Plus, the services of the mortgage broker is paid for by the bank, so it is free for the home buyer.

CJN: What is your opinion of getting pre-approved for a mortgage?

Guy Scheiner of Venture Financial Ltd: On one hand, pre-approval is very important because you know the exact loan amount you are approved for, which will make you more knowledgeable and comfortable when putting in an offer for a home.

But what you can qualify for in terms of a loan, is not necessarily what you can afford. The bank can approve you for a mortgage, but in reality, it may exceed all of your obligations. A broker can help in this regard, too, because they represent the borrower's interests.

CJN: What is your view of reverse mortgages – people using the equity in their home as part of retirement planning?

Sonny Goldstein of Goldstein Financial Consultants: I have been in this business for 41 years, and I believe from all of that experience that reverse mortgages are a ripoff. The interest charged on them is extremely high, and I have seen people lose their homes as a result.

For people who are planning for their retirement, I recommend getting competent, professional, independent advice from a certified financial planner, a chartered financial consultant or someone who will show them the best way to augment their lifestyle.

Condo to reflect 'Portrait' of the neighbourhood

In late March, Elm Developments will introduce Portrait Condominiums – an eight-storey mid-rise in the popular Bathurst and Sheppard neighbourhood of North York. The building will feature garden terraces reminiscent of sunny Italy, a rare feature in Toronto condominiums. The complex will also include a European-style garden rooftop deck, manicured gardens and courtyards. Plus, the halls and key common areas of Portrait Condominiums will be graced with an inspiring art collection.

Portrait Condominiums will be nestled into quiet residential surroundings, close to every amenity imaginable including, Burnett Park and Hearthstone Valley Greenbelt. Active suite owners will also appreciate being close to Earl Bales Park – home to an alpine ski centre with snowmaking facilities and the 1,500-seat Barry Zukerman Amphitheatre – and Downsview Park, which includes more than 572 acres of land being developed as a unique, recreational urban green space. In addition to a shopping plaza and 24-hour Dominion across the street, there are many local stores, services, large shopping centres, cinemas and a live theatre in the vicinity. The subway and major transportation routes such as Highway 401, are just minutes away.

The well-respected, award-winning design team for Portrait Condominiums includes Northgrave Architect Inc., which has created many distinguished projects in Toronto, Chicago, Boston and New York. For this venture, the firm has teamed up with Trevor Kruse of Hudson Kruse Design, which specializes in high-end projects. Known for balancing functionality and ingenuity in interior design, the award-winning Hudson Kruse Design also has an impressive portfolio of notable residential clients across North America, and Kruse is a past president of ARIDO (The Association of Registered Interior Designers of Ontario).

Portrait Condominiums is characterized by scenic terraces overlooking lush garden walkways and peaceful courtyards. "The Portrait Club" will feature a luxurious party room, complete with a fireplace opening onto a landscaped patio with outdoor seating, a dining room for private functions with a catering kitchen and bar area, a billiards room with large-screen TV, and for the exercise enthusiast, a fully equipped fitness area, yoga/stretch room and private change rooms with his and her steam rooms.

In addition, Portrait Condominiums will have a guest suite for family and friends to enjoy, a pet spa, and a potting room to get an early start on spring flowers. The south-facing fifth floor rooftop deck and outdoor kitchen, will allow for summer barbeques overlooking the skyline of downtown Toronto.

Finishes in the 192 suites will include engineered wood flooring; ceramic or marble foyer tile; plush broadloom; granite kitchen countertop; ceramic backsplash; full-height uppers; valance lighting; and granite or marble bath countertops. With energy savings and the environment in mind, Elm Developments has also incorporated numerous building and suite features such as individual hydro monitoring; ENERGY STAR® appliances; locally sourced flooring created from 100 per cent recycled content core material; bicycle storage; and landscaping and storm water management, among other features.

For more than 25 years, Elm Developments has transformed innovative design ideas into reality by creating smarter living areas in high-rise landmarks across the city. Suites at Portrait Condominiums will range in size from 585 to 1,700 sq. ft. and will be priced from $190,000 to over $600,000.

Homes in Ottawa development are energy efficient

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

Environmental awareness and conservation are hot topics in every arena these days and purchasing a home or condo that reflects those values is sparking interest with buyers.

The Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design is a rating system conducted by a third party that grades existing and new buildings and development practices through the implementation of green tools and performance standards. In order for a construction site to be stamped with LEED Certification, it has to meet all five of LEED's credits and prerequisites, which are sustainable site, water efficiency, energy and atmosphere, materials and resources, and indoor environment quality.

Minto homes are advanced in energy efficiency

One of the most prominent developers in the housing market is Minto, and it's a part of LEED's green initiative. Minto ensures that the designing and building of all of its high-rise communities are LEED-rated buildings, and its new, detached single-family homes are Energy Star certified.

In Canada, residential, commercial and institutional buildings are responsible for more than one-third of the total of greenhouse gas emissions, according to the Canada Building Green Council, and Minto has signed onto LEED's initiative to reduce these harmful emissions. Minto has been one of Canada's top residential builders and developers for more than 50 years, and it's a company committed to building a sustainable future.

Unlike a number of its counterparts, Minto lives up to its corporate responsibility to protecting the environment. It's been a dedicated pioneer in energy efficiency and green-building practices since the 1970s when it created its Energy-Wise standard of new-home construction by choosing renewable and less harmful fuels to power its living spaces.

This year, construction began on the EQuilibrium Housing Initiative in the southern end of Ottawa. The Minto Manotick House is Minto's EcoHome, situated in a Minto housing community in Manotick, Ottawa. Every one of the 1,800 single-family homes in this new neighbourhood has been built to create healthy, energy-efficient housing that produces as much energy as it consumes annually.

Minto's principle is about crafting attractive, affordable well-built homes and condominiums that satisfy the needs and demands of its clients and the environment.

Whether you're buying one of its new residential homes or high-rise condos in Toronto or renting an apartment, furnished suite, house, executive office or commercial space in Ottawa, Minto's eco motto stays the same.

For more information on Minto's developments in Toronto, call 416-977-0777, and in Ottawa call, 613-230-7051, or visit the company's website at www.minto.com.

Quality and service sets Queensgate Homes apart

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

If it's custom-home design you're looking for on the hunt for your new home, Queensgate Homes is an ideal builder to select in helping you find your dream home.

For more than 30 years, Queensgate builders have produced a wide array of attractive residential and commercial developments. With an ample collection of housing styles to choose from – from custom-crafted masterpieces in elite neighbourhoods in Forest Hill and Lawrence Park to intimate townhome communities and spacious country estates – you'll find Queensgate homes and communities throughout Southern Ontario.

Homes in Aurora, Woodbridge, Mississauga, Brooklin, Georgetown and Whitby attest to Queensgate's philosophy of building superior living spaces.

Queensgate's mandate is to build quality homes that satisfy each customer's requirements and wishes, whether it's custom-design detailing or reliable craftsmanship.

"Whats sets us apart [from other builders] is our quality, service and the product we produce with our developments and custom homes," said Queensgate president Silvana Palombo.

Purchasing a home is a life investment, and it's important to select the one that reflects your style or familial needs.

What makes Queensgate unique compared to other home and community builders is that its staff works with clients to help turn vague ideas into concrete reality, with everything from shaping a circular driveway to putting arched entrances in every room.

Queensgate also builds neighbourhoods with an eye to making life easy for homeowners.

"When we put a site together, we try and take everything into consideration," said Palombo, referring to the Queensgate community at Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road in Vaughan, which is close to public transit services and is walking distance to the area's new Jewish community centre.

As a member in good standing of the Greater Toronto Home Builders' Association, Queensgate is part of the Ontario New Home Warranty Program. In addition, Queensgate was honoured with the President's Achievement Award and nominated for the prestigious Ernest Assaly Builder Award.

For more information on Queensgate Homes, visit www.QueensGateHomes.com, or call 905-264-0600.

Condo project aims to build community

By all accounts Sophia, the vibrant new condominium about to rise from Bathurst Street and Patricia Avenue just north of Finch, is a jewel. Unlike many other projects in Toronto, it manages to combine the intimacy of a true, self-contained community with an unbeatable location.

"The great lure of a project like Sophia starts with its setting," says Mark Cohen, senior vice-president of The Condo Store Marketing Systems, a consultant on the project. "It is in the heart of one of the city's best loved neighborhoods.

"Go further north or further south and you run into busy street traffic, a real distraction to quiet enjoyment. But Sophia sits in the heart of a quiet, well-established residential neighborhood, where you can walk within minutes to parks, places of worship, schools and street-level shopping."

If you need to go further afield, Highway 401 is minutes away by car. Bathurst Street leads straight south to the heart of the city and TTC buses stop almost at the doorstep.

Then there is the building itself. Architectural firm Page + Steele has created a classically modern, glass and steel, 10-storey tower that makes best use of both inside and outside spaces. Every unit has a generous balcony, patio or terrace.

Buyers will be amazed at the range of housing choices offered in a single building,

Sophia condominium is in the heart of a residential neighbourhood says Cohen. The first and second floors, for example, hold a mix of large, two-storey maisonettes featuring up to three bedrooms, and a series of single level suites, all with private patios.

The balance of the tower is devoted to a range of sizes and designs from one-bedroom units coming in at just under 700 square feet, right up to three-bedroom suites measuring up to 1,500 square feet. The range of choices is impressive, says Cohen.

"In fact Cityzen Development Group and the Myriad Group, which are partners in Sophia, have just released a new collection of suites," he adds. "There are truly stunning two-level maisonettes – New York comes to North York – and a selection of roomy, one-bedroom pieds-a-terre.

"The range of housing options is one of those things that set Sophia apart," Cohen continues. "The entire project was designed to replicate a balanced community with homes for everyone from young singles just starting out, to couples contemplating retirement."

That approach to creating a balanced community is reflected in both the range and layout of the amenities within the structure.

The fitness centre and workout areas are set apart from those spaces devoted to entertaining, just as they would be in any well-thought-out city neighborhood. Finally, there is the terrific value that Sophia represents, Cohen says.

"This is a first-rate project in a first-rate neighbourhood priced at well under $400 a square foot, something increasingly rare among new condos today," he says.

A terrific price considering the quality of finishes and fixtures including, elegant 9' and 12' ceiling heights, floor-to-ceiling windows, individually controlled heating and air conditioning, architecturally designed suite entries, a choice of spectacular pre-finished engineered wood floors in living areas, dining areas and den. Plus, there's a choice of quality 40 oz. carpet with 1/2" underpad in bedrooms and closets.

Kitchens feature finely crafted cabinetry, complete with taller upper cabinets in a variety of materials and colours, a choice of attractive granite countertops, a choice of ceramic backsplashes, double bowl stainless steel sink with single-lever faucet and pull-out vegetable sprayer, ceiling mounted halogen track lighting, a choice of distinctive ceramic or porcelain floor tiles and six brand name appliances.

To see Sophia for yourself, visit the presentation centre on the southeast corner of Bathurst Street and Patricia Avenue or visit the web site at www.sophiacondos.ca or telephone 416-777-9998.

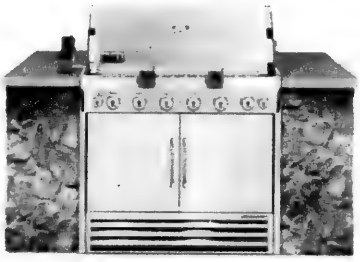
Sobie's has all the answers for barbecues

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

With the arrival of refreshing warm weather, it's time to roll out the barbecues for a great outdoor meal.

Whether you're planning to enjoy a meal with the family or entertain a large crowd, there are many factors to consider when choosing from the wide variety of barbecues on the market.



First, consider what type of fuel you'd like to use, be it propane or natural gas, explained Mark Herberman, sales manager at Sobie's Barbecues in Toronto. There is also the option of using charcoal, as well as smokers for the unmatched aroma and flavour of grilled food.

Then, figure out the types of features you would like, such as side, rear or infrared burners. Also, decide on the size of the barbecue, taking into account where you want to put it and how many people you plan to cook for.

Models will also vary based on the type of food you want to cook. You may want to prepare hamburgers and hot dogs, sear stakes, or even make stir-fry meals.

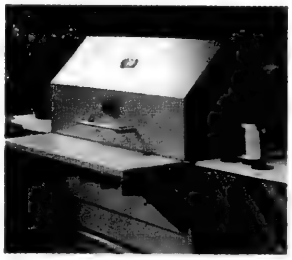
The warranty also makes a difference.

"The longer the warranty, the more the manufacturer knows that barbecue is going to last," said Herberman.

Sobie's specializes in high-end barbecues, with prices ranging from $350 to more than $12,000.

Top-of-the-line barbecues include the infrared gas TEC barbecues, which are also available as built-ins and portable versions. While most grills cook with convection, working like an oven, TEC grills heat the food directly, which allows the food to cook in one-third of the regular time.

Napoleon and Weber grills are also effective. The grill bases are made from high-grade stainless steel or aluminum castings, so you won't have to worry about the grill rusting. Webers also have "flavourizer bars" that create great flavour without flare-ups.



Those looking to purchase a barbecue on a tighter budget may want to get a Broil King model. Their three-position, cast-iron cooking grids retain the heat and sear meats, and they feature deep, thick castings.

"Try to stick with a North American product," said Herberman, "because later on down the road when you need parts, and eventually you will, if you get it in North America, chances are you will be able to get parts for it years down the road."

To ensure the barbecue remains in good condition, it's important to keep it clean. Barbecues should remain covered when they are not in use to prevent dust, dirt, birds, insects, or branches from getting in. Grill wipes and brushes can be used to remove any of that, and this should be done a few times per year.

"If you have a natural gas line, you should use a combination of soap and water on all of the joints," said Herberman.

"Make sure that there are no bubbles so there are no gas leaks.

"Make sure propane tanks are firmly screwed on. If anyone neglects the cleaning too much, a lot of debris can get filled up underneath and cause flaring that is not pleasant."

Sobie's offers servicing and cleaning to most barbecue models.

His carpets are a work of art

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you're choosing a hand-woven carpet for your home, you may want to consult with an expert.

Nicolas Hornbostel, owner of Rug as Art (416-925-3399), at 326 Davenport Rd., in Designers Walk, has been importing rugs to Canada for 17 years and is known for his customized hand-woven rugs.

He's part of a family business that's based in Belgium, he says. "I'm more interested in the creative component. I design the tapestries and carpets. I like the more artsy part of the business."

Hornbostel specializes in carpets from Pakistan, India, Nepal and Tibet. "All the rugs are hand-woven from wool, wool and silk or silk. All of them have a different look. The rug styles are named for the places where they are made."

Each area has its own weaving technique that can be anywhere from a few knots to 1,000 knots per square inch, he says. "The thinner the carpet, the more knots there are and finer the quality."

Hornbostel actually purchases wool in New Zealand and brings it to his carpet weavers in Asia. "New Zealand wool is absolutely the highest quality in the world."

These days, the most popular rugs are those made with vegetable dyes, he says. "They give a carpet an antique look, like they're aged. They often come in beiges, golds and olive greens. They're earth tones. That's what designers like to use."

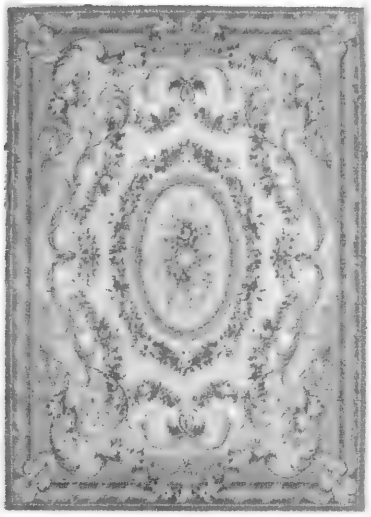
Peshawar is the area near the Pakistan and Afghanistan border where the vegetable-dyed carpets are made, he explains.

Hornbostel stresses that the wool is all hand-spun and hand-dyed. "We use organic dyes. It's the same techniques that have been used for hundreds of years."

As for patterns, he points out that city weavers do more sophisticated designs. "There are more details and the knotting is finer."

French Aubusson carpets are also popular, says Hornbostel. He describes the Aubusson as a "flat-weave needlepoint carpet" typical of those found in French chateaus.

Hornbostel says he is able to replicate the more intricate designs of antique tapestries. "We're reproducing them and they can be customized. We can produce the old tapestries in any size."



He takes the antique designs and brings them to the weavers. "I tell them what I want."

He says the colour palette of these carpets can also be customized – they're woven in colours chosen by designers. "We work very closely with designers."

Up to 35 different colours can be used in a rug, and there can be as many as 120 in a tapestry, according to Hornbostel. "We specialize in colouring. We're known for colour."

Business hours for Rug as Art are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday to Saturday. or by appointment. Customers can also visit the website at www.rugasart.ca.

An eclectic group of dealers at Antiques on King

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Thirty years ago, Cynthia Findlay (416-260-9057) started selling estate jewelry outdoors at a picnic table at the original Harbourfront Antique Market. "It was just a lark. I fell in love with the whole antique business," she says.

Today, she has her own store and she manages the market.

Findlay became a dealer at the Harbourfront Antique Market when it became a permanent indoor facility. It was subsequently housed in two separate locations in Queen's Quay. When the second venue was no longer viable, the dealers had to scramble to find a new home.

Ed and David Mirvish came to their rescue some six years ago, offering them space in a former Mirvish restaurant at 276 King St. W. The dealers now occupy an 18,000-square-foot space known as Toronto Antiques on King.

Not only did Findlay move there with all the original dealers, but she and her husband, George Paterson, ended up becoming the managers of the antique market. She lauded the Mirvishes for providing them with their new space. "They were happy to rent us this market. They were unbelievable to work with. The company is very supportive," she says.

She and the other dealers are now happily ensconced in the heart of the Theatre District, so they are very accessible to the public. "We think of ourselves as the waiting room for the theatre," Findlay says. "Lots of people love to come into the building and browse. There's so much to see."

Findlay, who specializes in estate jewelry, fine porcelain and objets d'art, shares the space with an eclectic group of dealers. "The diversity of the dealers and their backgrounds makes this market," she says, noting that they sell such fine collectibles as Oriental and bronze art; vintage lighting; china and ceramics; pressed glass; antique furniture; militaria; nostalgia; Tibetan artifacts; Persian carpets; and vintage jewelry and furs.

> Antique shop is "waiting room" for theatre district

Findlay says there are items at the market dating back to 1750, commonly known as Georgian, through to Victorian, Art Nouveau, Art Deco, Retro and Art Moderne. "Toronto is lucky to have such a world-class antique market in the centre of the city. We're known internationally."

Indeed, Toronto Antiques on King has long provided props for period movies, including Chicago and Cinderella Man, which were filmed in Toronto, says Findlay, adding that they're now renting out objects for the set of Amelia, an American movie being shot in Toronto.

The antique market is a magnet for well-known local designers such as Brian Gluckstein, Kimberley Seldon, Lynn Spence, Sarah Richardson and Lori Morris, says Findlay. "The decorators are looking for fine objects for fine homes. Our prices and selection are wonderful."

She says the Chan Gallery of Fine Clocks and Chinese Art and the Shand Gallery, which specialize in Oriental and bronze fine art, attracts many visitors. "Mr. Shand is an international dealer from the original market. It's also his 30th year."

Cynthia Findlay Antiques, her store, is known for its large selection of estate jewelry, silver and porcelain, she says. "We carry George Jensen and Pedersen [sterling], Lalique [glass] and Moorcroft and Majolica [art pottery]."

She also has vintage silver Shabbat candlesticks, which make "great wedding gifts," she says.

You can also find fine Judaica items at the Heritage Antique Gallery run by Tatiana Kuchinsky. "Tatiana also carries art and sculpture," Findlay notes.

Toronto Antiques on King is open every day, except Monday, from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Cottage owners give solace to cancer survivors

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

When Seana O'Neill's mother, a two-time breast cancer survivor, had cancer, she and the family found some solace at their cottage. It was an ideal place for healing.

As an adult cottage owner, O'Neill realized that her cottage, which was vacant on weekdays, could be utilized during that time period. Recalling the restorative power of the cottage during her mother's illness, O'Neill wanted to provide that experience to other cancer survivors and their families.

She knew there were many other cottages that were empty during the week, and she thought that weekdays would be an ideal time to offer cancer survivors a cottage vacation.

All she needed was cottagers willing to donate their homes.

In 2003, she launched the Cottages Dreams Cancer Recovery Initiative, an organization that matches cottage owners with recent cancer survivors.

Today, O'Neill is founding president of a registered Canadian charity that's grown exponentially, according to Hilary Elia, development director for Cottage Dreams.

That first summer, six families were placed. Since then, hundreds of people have benefitted from the program, said Elia, noting that the cancer survivors and their families essentially use the cottages from Sunday until Friday.

There are more than 500 cottages in the database – including some kosher ones – offering vacations from June until October, Elia added. "We contact Wellspring, hospitals, any place where cancer patients network. Unfortunately, it's not too difficult to find people."

There are also many referrals from the Hospital for Sick Children, she said.

To be eligible, a patient must complete treatment within a year of being placed at the cottage, she explained.

"We celebrate cancer survival and the family... Regardless of who has it, all members of the family are affected," Elia said. "That's why Cottage Dreams has been so successful. It celebrates survival and the family unit."

Elia stresses that the vacation gives family members an opportunity to reconnect with one another. "They can create some fun family memories."

She added: "Being in a new environment is restorative. A change is as good as a rest when you're dealing with cancer. You can take a breather and re-energize.

"The cottage is a catalyst for making everyone feel better. It's a gift of time from someone you don't know. It's like them saying, 'Congratulations. You've survived cancer. We want to give you a week.'"

Elia said people may need a break but may not have the energy to plan a getaway. "People are physical and emotionally exhausted and may not have the resources to put together a family vacation."

Use of the cottages is not restricted to families. Sometimes, they're used by a cancer survivor and his or her support network, Elia said.

The program stipulates that a maximum of six people can use the cottage, but there's flexibility as to who accompanies the cancer survivors, she explains.

The contact between cottage owner and survivors varies.

"Some families like to welcome the families. Some families want to meet the family and congratulate the survivor and say, 'Here's the key,'" Elia said.

"Some of the survivors want to meet the cottagers to show their gratitude."

Cottage Dreams enlists cottagers at the spring and fall Cottage Life Shows, Elia said. "It's a great opportunity to raise awareness about the program."

The organization is always looking for more cottages, as well as funds to offset the cost of families' week-long stays, she says.

Cottage Dreams is a registered charity, so cottage donors get a charitable donation receipt for the time used by survivors.

Elia said the organization's major fundraising event is an annual golf tournament, which takes place this year on July 7 at Clublink Wyndance in Uxbridge. "There are limited foursomes and sponsorships left."

For more information about the tournament, donations or participation in the program, visit the www.cottagedreams.org, or contact Elia at at 705-457-9100 or by e-mail at helia@cottagedreams.org.

Want to get away from the cold? Move to Arizona

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Canadians are flocking to Arizona and it's not just snowbirds flying down.

Recently, Barry Zekelman, 41, a steel manufacturer from Windsor, made headlines in Canada and the United States when he purchased a home in Phoenix for the record-setting price of $14 million.

"It was the highest priced sale we've ever had," says Neil Schneider (602-571-4586), a Phoenix-based realtor at Prudential Arizona Properties. He says there is a range of properties and age-restricted communities and condominiums to choose from, starting at about $100,000.

The big draw is the hot, dry weather, he says, noting that Phoenix offers year-round golfing. "The Phoenix metropolitan area has more golf courses per capita any other city in the U.S."

He notes that the city has grown dramatically. In 1950, Phoenix was the 57th-largest city in the United States. Today, it's the fifth largest. "There is in excess of three million residents. We just beat out Philadelphia for fifth spot.

"The urban city offers many of the cultural attractions people are used to in urban areas in the north."

He says there is a large community of retired Canadians in Phoenix and they're making connections with the Jewish community there. He describes it as a "wonderful community" of approximately 100,000 people.

"We have every stripe of synagogue and two Jewish community centres."

He says while the Jewish community is more spread out than in his native Detroit, one can find large Jewish enclaves in Scotsdale, a suburb eight miles from downtown Phoenix, and in the Chandler Gilbert area in the Southeast valley.

Joani Frankel (602-953-4000, ext. 2439) of John Hall and Associates (www.infoarizona.com) is another real estate agent working out of Phoenix. A former Toronto resident, Frankel says she left Canada 30 years ago because she couldn't tolerate the winter weather. "I said I was never going to be a victim of the cold again."

Phoenix offers great weather and attractions.

The New York state native did some checking and discovered that Arizona had the best climate. She and her then-husband packed up their two children in 1978, and Phoenix became their new home.

Frankel deals in new homes and resale from multimillion-dollar mansions to downtown lofts and studios. "I provide people with all the information they'll need to make a wise decision."

For new homes, she says real estate agents provide an excellent service to buyers. "We can save people a pile of money. We know the ins and outs that builders don't tell buyers."

She says the Phoenix market is not just for snowbirds. In fact, some people buy properties to establish residency so that their children can get landed status.

Frankel says the time is favourable for Canadians to buy property in Phoenix because of the high value of the Canadian dollar. She stresses that it's also a buyer's market because there's a large supply of homes currently on the market.

"It's a great time to buy. There are fabulous retirement and adult communities. You don't have to spend millions to get a beautiful home."

She says Phoenix offers all the amenities and cultural attractions of urban living. "You can walk to everything. It's not a sleepy cowboy town anymore. There are fine restaurants, and fine shopping.

"Anything you see on Rodeo Drive, you'll see here, but it's low key. Money isn't flaunted here like in other places."

Frankel also works with a team of people, from mortgage brokers to painters and movers, who can facilitate the purchase and the move. "I have great people to back me up."

As for property taxes, she says vacation homes for personal use are taxed at the same rate as any other property, but taxes for income properties used only for rental are between 20 and 30 per cent higher.

To give people an idea of prices, she says a 2,400-square-foot ranch bungalow cost about half a million dollars.

"The weather is wonderful and you're safe from hurricanes in Arizona. It's an incredible place to live. Right now, I'm sitting by my pool under the palm trees and citrus trees drinking fresh Valencia orange juice for breakfast. There's nothing like picking your fruit fresh from the tree."

A unique lifestyle community on the lake

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

As baby boomers hit retirement age, a new crop of services and products has appeared to make the golden years more comfortable. A new community 90 minutes from northern Toronto is in the works that caters to empty nesters and baby boomers, and offers all the amenities of a condo with all the perks of a cottage.

The development is Sophie's Landing, a gated waterfront lifestyle community in Orillia on the north shore of Lake Simcoe, just west of the Narrows, where Lake Simcoe meets Lake Couchiching (www.sophies-landing.ca; 705-329-7710).

Developer Eric Kerzner, whose company Signature Carleton is spearheading the project, named the development after his daughter. He intends to take his brand of planned communities across Canada and the United States.

With a background in hotels and resorts, he developed the first lifestyles community in British Columbia eight years ago, with a focus on the luxuries usually found only in upscale resorts.

Kerzner is now focused on developing a product to serve the boomer market in Toronto. He recognized the lack of any gated communities north of Toronto. Sophie's Landing is designed with empty nesters and snowbirds in mind, who are heading for retirement and want a home that's maintenance-free.

The complex, made up of 85 units, is already 80 per cent sold. It includes a games room, two swimming pools and billiard tables. Because the community is on a lake, there is a private marina with 36 boat slips and a floating gazebo. Public areas include a fireside espresso lounge, waterside terraces and a party room with a full kitchen and a barbecue area. The property also offers winding nature trails, a putting green and a fitness and spa facility.

The peaceful location puts residents within easy access to cross country skiing, skating, golf courses, fishing, mountain biking and snowmobile trails. Nearby Orillia holds regular festivals, and Casino Rama is a few minutes away by car.

Kerzner notes that "everything is within walking distance. We chose this location for the amenities nearby."

Sophie's Landing will be finished at the end of 2009. Still available are detached bungalows with optional lofts, full basements and attached garages. Prices start at $329,900 but go up to $750,000, with home size starting at 1,000 square feet and going to 3,500 square feet. The average is 1,500 square feet.

Kerzner wants to make Sophie's Landing better than planned subdivisions in the city.

"We encourage purchasers to make changes, start with the base model and change things to fit their lifestyles and needs. We don't want two homes alike. We don't want it to seem like a subdivision."

The community, designed to evoke a French country village with easy pedestrian access, has already been rated the number 1 lifestyle community in Ontario by Active Adult magazine.

Bathroom modifications can help you enjoy your home longer

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

As you age, you often have to make a number of changes in your lifestyle and activities. But what about changing your home?

This may not be the first thought that comes to mind if you have to make adaptations to enable you to remain in your home, but sometimes the washroom is one of the first areas that needs a makeover. Since even contemplating these changes can be difficult, we've found two of the city's finest companies to help you.

One expert option for age-proofing your home is Lampert Plumbing (www.lampertplumbing.com; 416-787 5285). The Lamperts have been the masters of bathroom and kitchen renovations and repairs since 1926. Today, Lampert Plumbing is run by Lawrence and Arthur Lampert, grandsons of the company's founder, Hy Lampert.

Among the company's specializations is age-proofing the home with the least possible inconvenience to the client. Lampert Plumbing focuses on providing simple and inexpensive ways to equip your home. Lampert also guarantees excellent customer service, highly skilled workmanship and an unparallelled understanding of plumbing and renovations.

One of the services offered by Lampert is the Re-Bath liner system which can transform your bathroom in only two days by simply installing new liners over your old tub and wall.

Transform your bathroom in two days

"Most renovations take upward of a week and require dust removal, which is very difficult for some elderly clients," says Lawrence Lampert. "Working with the liner system allows us to provide an excellent quality product while being virtually in and out."

Lampert ensures the utmost practicality in the features they install.

"Some clients request that we install a permanent seat in the tub, but this is not always the wisest choice," Lampert says. "We always recommend a removable seat, so that it can be placed closer to the faucet if necessary. As well, it can be moved if a caretaker needs to be in the tub as well."

Another feature offered by Lampert is a walk-in-tub, which includes a door and grab bars, because "avoiding accidents is what's most important," Lampert says.

With more than 30 years of plumbing experience, Plumbers Canada (www.plumberscanada.com; 416-444-4499) is another company that can help with your plumbing needs. Owners Jeffrey and Aviva Shiff are no strangers to plumbing and offer a fresh take on renovations, retrofits and repairs. In addition, expert staff is available 24 hours a day via the Plumbers Canada hotline at the above number.

"With such a large aging population, we recognize that there is a major need for help with renovating the home," Jeffrey Shiff says. "Since more people prefer to stay home as they age, we provide the modifications so that they can do so and feel safe."

From complex renovations to simple add-ons, Plumbers Canada will work with your existing space and your budget to provide a solution for anything you may need to make aging at home more comfortable for yourself or your loved ones.

Shiff recommends that you start by attending to the bathroom fixtures that are used most frequently.

"For example, toilets are the most used feature of the bathroom, so your first step should be attaching grab bars to simplify sitting down and standing up," he says.

Replacing bathtubs with walk-in showers is another step he suggests for age-proofing your home. "If you don't need help getting in and out of the bathtub, it will be much easier to keep your independence for longer."

Plumbers Canada will not only help you find an affordable solution, the staff will co-ordinate with other contractors who may be working in your home.

"For most people, staying at home is preferable," he says. "We provide a way to maintain safety and dignity so that people can do so with ease, but most importantly, we care about our work and stand by our quality," Shiff says.

Aspiring musician opts for something more solid

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

David Solursh, founder of Concrete Tides, has a solution for people who are tired of the traditional look of granite countertops.

For the past four years, Solursh, a 32-year-old North York native has been developing his business in Collingwood, Ont., that specializes in custom concrete fabrications for vanities, hearths, bar tops, countertops and more.

"All of my clients are searching for something handmade. People seek me out when they want something that no one else has, or they want something that isn't made by a machine, like a slab of granite at the local box store," Solursh said.

He said the trend has been popular in the southern United States for more than 10 years, and it's just beginning to gain popularity here in Canada.

"As people are researching and looking for something new and different, they're catching on to it and getting their heads wrapped around the idea that concrete doesn't have to be this grey, nasty-looking thing," he said.

"It can be anything. It can take any shape, depending on what your mould is. For a countertop purpose, I like to polish them so they are totally smooth and shiny," he said, adding that it can come in any colour imaginable, because he is able to mix dyes into the concrete mixture.

"I can really predict how the colour is going to come out. And if there ever was a chip or something happened to it, it would still retain the same colour," he said.

Although Solursh is passionate about his art and his budding business, until six years ago, the father of two was on a completely different path.

Solursh, a Concordia University graduate with a degree in fine arts, was an aspiring musician.

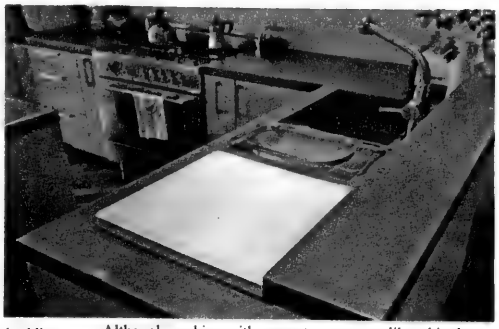
When he decided to give up on a career in the music industry because of the difficulty of finding consistent, paying work, he began working for a friend who is a builder, and the two of them did extensive research on the best way to work with concrete.

"I started experimenting. I did lots of reading," he said.

Two years later, in 2004, he established Concrete Tides and his client list has been growing steadily since.

Solursh specializes in countertops, hearths and vanities, but he said he has also started to create monuments that commemorate the loss of loved ones.

"I recently made a bench, in which a bronze plaque was inset, to celebrate the life of a family friend," he said.



Although working with concrete may seem like a big departure from making music, Solursh said the two arts are very similar is some ways.

"When you step on stage to play a piece of music in front of an audience, you sure as heck better know your stuff, because once you start playing you can't stop and edit. You must push on through, and flow with the timeline until you finish the piece. Concrete is the same. You make a structure, your mould, which takes time, patience and great detail," he said.

Solursh added that he takes his work very seriously and has ambitions to go to a school in North Carolina to enhance his self-taught knowledge of the art.

"Being a kid from a very accomplished Jewish family from the north end of Toronto, there are pressures, or expectations set upon you, that I never seemed to accomplish," he said, adding that his grandfather was Dr. Coleman Solursh, one of the founders of Mount Sinai Hospital.

"It is this need to push for something greater, that I bring into anything I do… For the past six years now, I have been refining my skills and searching for my niche."

He said that people shouldn't view his pieces as cheap alternatives to granite. In fact, the price is comparable to good granite, which sells for about $100 to $120 a square foot.

"If you want a high end, really beautiful artistic piece of product, you should probably have someone who knows what they are doing."

He said homeowners need to be wary of inexperienced people who are just trying to make a quick buck.

"They go and buy a bag of concrete from the store and mix it up and say, 'Here you go.' I've seen people offering that, and then you're asking for big trouble because it's just going to crack and stain," he said.

"People have to know that the concrete you use for your countertop isn't the normal stuff that comes from a ready-mix plant or from your local hardware store. It's a product that is meant specifically for countertops. I make my own mix, and I've tried different recipes."

Environmental responsibility is another aspect of his business that's important to him.

"I go through a whole polishing phase where I will wet grind the product, so I try to recycle the water and not waste it," he said.

Solursh said he recently began working with a California company that uses a chemical to seal the concrete counter tops called lithium silicate, which is more environmentally friendly than epoxy and urethane, which he has used in the past.

He added that he also uses vinegar to clean the product, rather than harsh chemicals.

"It's made so that when you're cleaning, you're using products that are healthy for the environment."

Solursh said the most fulfilling part of his business is working with his clients to create a custom piece of art they will take pride in.

"What brings me more joy than creating the pieces themselves are my meetings with clients to discuss their visions, and to see their faces when I deliver something that makes them feel as if they were there when I created it."

Designers Walk holds its annual sample sale

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special To The CJN

If you're decorating or remodelling your home, you may want to ask your interior designer or decorator to take a stroll through Designers Walk.

Designers Walk is a group of design showrooms housed in five buildings in the Davenport and Avenue roads area. The addresses are 170 Bedford Rd., 150 Pears Ave., and 354, 320 and 326 Davenport Rd.

"Most of the buildings' showrooms are leased out to top-of-the-line design companies, says Orly Borovitch (416-961-1211), Designers Walk's director of public relations.

"All the products are very high quality with a strong emphasis on design, hence the name Designers Walk. Designer's Walk has been around for 30 years."

There are almost 100 members covering all aspects of design and home and commercial renovation, she notes, citing a few of the many companies with showrooms: Benjamin Moore (paints), G.E. Monogram Appliances, Cercan Tile (stone and ceramic flooring), Avenue Rug, Primavera Interior Furnishings (fabrics and furnishings) and Art Boulle (cast aluminum and wood indoor/outdoor designs and furniture).

The showrooms, which are exclusively geared to design professionals, provide a source for interior designers, decorators, architects and others in the industry, Borovitch says.

To order products, designers need to show proof of their professional status, but some showrooms let the designers bring clients.

The advantage of visiting Designers Walk is that it offers the full gamut of designer goods within a one-block radius, Borovitch says. "It's one-stop shopping for such things as wallpaper, tiling, lighting, furniture, appliances and countertops."

One of the spaces anyone can visit is the Resource Centre, which is at 168 Bedford Rd. The 10,000-square-foot space has display booths, panel discussions and regularly showcases new distributors, she says. "The monthly seminars on design are open to the public and trades."

At the end of May, Designers Walk will be opening a sustainable design area within the resource centre. "Eco-friendly products are really big right now, Borovitch says.There'll be a sustainable design area with new displays featuring eco-friendly products.

"Either they're water efficient or LED [light emitting diode] lighting, which is energy efficient. There'll be rugs and carpets of natural and renewable fibre and paints with a low or no VOCs [volatile organic compounds].

On June 7, Designers Walk holds its annual summer sample sale, which is open to the public, Borovitch says. "It's like a flea market of high-end designs at a fraction of the cost. Furniture, rugs, leather goods, beautiful designer chairs all become affordable."

"Members of Designer's Walk will set up tents and booths outside on Pears Avenue, and in the building's garage."

There will also be a silent auction with part of the proceeds of the sale going to to Habitat for Humanity. Some initiatives in the planning will be a consultation service called Shop with a Designer.

1717 Avenue offers luxury in the heart of North York

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

If you're seeking the luxurious lifestyle and want to stay in the heart of North York, look no further than the Terrace Garden Condominium.

Located at 1717 Avenue Rd., this new condominium with terraces and glass will feature top service and style that will keep you and your guests immersed in comfort and elegance.

Slated for occupancy in November 2010, the 80 suites in the six-storey condominium will feature finishes such as hardwood floors and Sub-Zero appliances. Most Sub-Zero refrigeration appliances are certified as Shabbat and holiday compliant by Star-K kosher certification.

Each suite also comes with one parking space and one locker, which are included in the purchase price. Some of the larger suites come with two parking spaces.

The suites range in size from 790 square feet to just under 3,400 square feet and are available from $700,000 up to more than $3 million.

"We made sure we wouldn't pass on any finishes that people would find in a million-dollar home within a three-kilometre radius of the site," said Scott McLellan, senior vice-president of sales and marketing for Tribute Communities, the residence's builder.

Tribute Communities has more than 20 years experience building more than 25,000 single family and condominium homes across the Greater Toronto Area. The company has won several industry awards for service from organizations such as the Tarion Warranty Corporation and J.D. Power and Associates.

Residents at 1717 Avenue Road will also enjoy a variety of amenities, including a fitness centre, men's and women's saunas, a private dining room, a party room with a terrace that can be booked for private functions, and a media room. There will also be a grand porte-cochere entrance with valet service and a 24-hour executive concierge.

The property is surrounded by established neighbourhoods and is within walking distance of an array of restaurants, shops, boutiques, delis and more.

This condominium will suit those selling their single family homes and looking to downsize, or professionals looking to stay near their parents or other relatives, or in the area they grew up in, McLellan said.

Some may also choose to spend part of the year at a cottage while maintaining a home in the city.

A presentation centre for the building is located at 1717 Avenue Rd. For more information call 416-430-1717, or visit www.tributecommunities.com.

Furnish the outdoors in contemporary style

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Your backyard is "an additional living room – it has to reflect the value of your home," says Dave Reburn of Deck & Dock (416-781-4887, www.deckanddock.ca).

But if you think you're stuck with off-the-shelf dining suites and chaises, think again.

"There are as many options for the outdoors as there are in the indoors," Reburn says.

Outdoor furniture is more exciting than ever, he adds. New long-lasting surfaces, look-alike synthetics that look just like natural materials, and a wider range of high-end choices make this a great time to shop and buy, whether it's for one piece or a complete set.

That includes upholstery choices, a pleasant surprise if you're used to the limited selection in hardware or mass-market stores. "In some cases here, we might have over a thousand different fabrics to choose from."

Although the retail customer is the biggest part of his business, many designers approach Deck & Dock for middle- to high-end quality products for their clients, which have included some of the top hotels and golf courses across Canada.

"We deliver anywhere – we've shipped to Florida and the Caribbean," says Reburn. He's even shipped to Africa, after the wife of former Kenyan prime minister Jomo Kenyatta shopped in person at the store's location in the heart of the Design District, at 1280 Castlefield Ave., near Caledonia Road and Eglinton Avenue, ordering some 65 pieces to be shipped to her Mombasa coastal home.

Throughout the season, Deck & Dock delivers twice weekly to cottage country. They also take care of setup, meaning you'll get your furniture right away, not a bunch of boxes to open and loose pieces to assemble.

This is not the lawn furniture of 20 years ago.

"The evolution of outdoor product has been quite dramatic." That's thanks to a shift in attitude of the general public. "It was a change of lifestyle… the outdoors became more important."

Take your living room outdoors

Today's outdoor furniture is as likely to be made of durable resin as anything that ever came from a tree, but you might not even be able to tell the difference at first.

"People look at the arm of a chair and ask, 'What kind of wood is it?'" Yet it's just as likely to be resin, finished in a mahogany pattern and shade.

Many customers come in asking, "Can it stay outside?" Increasingly, the answer is yes, in almost any weather. Until recently, the only durable all-weather materials were cast metal and tempered glass. These days, updated materials and finishes are sturdy enough to withstand the elements, but beautiful enough to want to show off.

Keeping real wicker outdoors is a risky proposition, with peeling, fading and warping a hazard if the furniture is unattended in bright sun or heavy rains. The newest wicker-look vinyl keeps its shape and colour. Built over a sturdy aluminum frame, "the material is not going to deteriorate in any way," says Reburn.

One of the biggest differences in purchasing high-quality outdoor furniture is warranty – high-end manufacturers stand behind their products. Many of Deck & Dock's pieces carry a five- or 10-year warranty, but Reburn says the pieces will probably outlast even that.

"You'll be tired of it before you have to throw it away."

He also specializes in exclusive pieces you won't find elsewhere – like the newest cantilevered and remote-control umbrellas to provide shade and convenience. With a cantilever, you get all the shade of a traditional umbrella, often in a much larger size, but the "pole" of the umbrella is off to the side so it doesn't interfere with conversation or mobility.

Adjustable-length dining tables are another important item, and there have been other big changes recently in outdoor tables, Reburn says.

Standard tables are just not long enough for outdoor entertaining. "People have gone from 48" and 72" perhaps now to 100 [inches]."

While a 72-inch table seats six, many people are realizing their family alone needs that much space. For adding guests and greater comfort, they're looking for ways to seat eight, 10 or even 12 at a single table.

The table itself is increasingly becoming a focal point, Reburn says, as more options become available, such as different tabletop finishes.

"It used to be the table was glass and the chair was the big concern. You'd sit in it – that's comfortable, that's a lovely looking chair… and you'd arbitrarily take the table."

Today's outdoor table can be a dramatic statement in itself, not just an accessory to a beautiful chair, with finishes ranging from traditional tempered glass to teak, cast aluminum or even an all-weather mosaic.

Showcasing high-quality manufacturers such as Brown Jordan, Gloster, Lloyd Flanders, Summer Classics and others in its airy, 8,000-square-foot store, Deck & Dock is an eye-opening experience.

"It's a unique shopping environment," says Reburn, noting the presence of trees, bridges and even skylights that let in natural light for fabric and colour selection.

Deck & Dock's five full-time staff bring an accumulation of many years' knowledge and experience to help customers select furniture that truly reflects their lifestyle. You can choose pieces – entire suites or a few items at a time – that will proudly accentuate one of the most important "rooms" of your home.

Program helps real estate agents understand seniors' needs

By MARCIE SOMERS
Special to The CJN

When David's parents decided to move from Montreal to Toronto to be closer to their children and grandchildren, selling their home proved to be extremely difficult. Not only were his parents leaving their home where they had lived for the past 40 years and raised a family, but they were also downsizing from a 3,500-square-foot home to a 2,000-square-foot condo.

Their daughter who lived in Calgary and David, in Toronto, both had their own families and were unable to help their parents make the transition as much as they would have liked to. Selling their furniture, packing, delivering goods to charities, arranging shipping of their household contents and helping negotiate on the closing of their home were all things David's parents had to do, with very little help from their children.

To make matters worse, their real estate agent literally disappeared once the offer was signed, only to reappear at closing. Calls to their agent in between that time were either ignored or returned days later.

In the end, moving became an exercise in frustration for David's parents.

"My parents are in their mid-70's and not in the best of health, so needless to say, there were times when they second-guessed their decision. At times, they felt it would have been easier for them to stay in Montreal," he says.

If only David had been introduced to Barry Lebow, a Toronto real estate appraiser, arbitrator, mediator and entrepreneur, his parents might have had a very different experience.

Barry Lebow

Lebow, who has more than 20 years' experience in real estate, has developed the accredited senior agent (ASA) professional designation program, a course that teaches real estate agents about the mature/seniors market.

According to Lebow, many people are either moving up (people are more demanding and affluent and want to maintain a certain lifestyle), moving down (their children move out and they don't need as much space, or people lose their jobs and can't afford to keep their home) or moving out into a retirement residence. The latter group is a very small percentage.

In addition, people are living longer. "In Canada alone, there are over 4,000 people over 100 years old. There's a myth that most seniors live in [retirement] homes. In fact, 93 per cent of Canadians over 65 live in their own residences," Lebow says. "As such, I saw a real need to educate real estate agents on how to deal with this very large and growing niche."

Over the course of two days, agents are taught how to penetrate the rapidly growing mature/seniors market. They learn, among many things, how to get their share of the coming explosion in the mature/seniors market; how to capture their share of the move-up, move-down or move-out markets; how to market to these clients; and how to understand the needs of mature/seniors clients. At the end of two days, agents take an exam in order to receive the ASA accreditation.

They're also taught how to service these clients after the deal is signed. "Agents are around up until the deal is signed and then reappear at closing. What about the in between?" Lebow says. "There are so many things that need to be done, such as packing, donating items to charity, arranging transportation of their goods, etc. I teach agents how to be more holistic and take a counsellor approach with this market."

Linda Hummel and Sophie Frattura of Remax Excellence took the ASA course this past February and are glad they did. "Barry clearly and accurately defined the seniors market for me as an agent," Hummel says. "He taught me how to market to seniors, including the lifestyle options available to them. The course also covered tax- and estate-planning issues as well, which was extremely helpful."

Frattura, her sister, agrees. "Linda and I were already dealing with seniors, and this course reinforced a counsellor selling approach. It helped us refocus our business to specifically market to seniors, and we've successfully been able to apply our learnings in our day-to-day business."

Since Lebow began offering the course in February, more than 200 agents have participated in the ASA course. Although the course is currently offered in Toronto only, Lebow has big plans. Over the next few months, he will be opening branches in Kamloops, B.C.; Halifax and Edmonton. The course is currently being translated into French for the Quebec market, which he hopes to enter in the fall.

He's also creating a virtual class on DVD for agents who live outside of major city centres and are unable to attend the class in person.

David's parents now live in Toronto and have settled into their new home, although moving to the city is an experience they would rather forget. When told about Lebow and what he's doing with the seniors market, David sighs. "If only it was the other way around (moving from Toronto to Montreal), my parents would have had a much more positive experience," he says.

'Garages are the last frontiers in home renovation'

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

While spring cleaning always seems like such a daunting task at first, it presents you with the opportunity to renew, recharge and transform your home from its drab winter state into a fresh environment ready for the summer.

More often than not, however, the garage is the last space that ever receives your attention, and while you would like to change that, where do you even begin? Isn't the garage where you throw everything that you don't want to see again? Have no fear, Garage Junkie is here!

For the past few months, Garage Junkie (www.garagejunkie.net, 416-457-8625) has been revolutionizing garages as we know them. "Garages are the last frontiers in home renovation, but it shouldn't be that way," says Warren Goodkin, Garage Junkie's owner.

"If you can't reach it, chances are that you won't use it," Goodkin says. "What we try to do is get it off the ground and onto the wall – that way, everything is fully accessible."

Perhaps most importantly, Goodkin cites security as a reason for clearing up garage clutter. "When we researched the topic, we found that most vehicle robberies were tied to the fact that the owners couldn't fit their car into the garage," he says.

Families with small children and toddlers should be aware that whatever is lying around the garage can be a hazard. As well, broken debris from concrete floors is often played with by toddlers and ingested. Liquids also should be stored in a cabinet away from children.

The experts at Garage Junkie will come to you and fully assess what needs to happen in your garage. "There's really nothing we can't do inside the garage," Goodkin boasts.

Working within your budget, Garage Junkie can do anything from a complete makeover to simply adding a few wall units to remove clutter from the ground. Goodkin comes to your home equipped with a trailer that doubles as a showroom.

"Just like the inside of your home, you should know where everything is," Goodkin advises. "The key is having a place for everything."

Garage Junkie achieves this organization by working with a series of expandable wall systems on which everything from shovels to bikes and hoses can be hung. Since the systems are expandable, additions can be made in the future. "Just snap the hooks in and you're ready to go," Goodkin says.

He suggests that a simple coat of paint is another way to improve the look of your garage. "It's a very simple step, but it completely brightens up the whole room!"

Garage Junkie achieves what you always dreamed of doing, but never seemed to have the time – whether it's simply being able to park your car or building a workshop full of tools. "An organized garage brings immense value to your home," Goodkin says. "It seems like a simple touch, but it makes a world of difference."

Treat yourself to a NEW experience in outdoor living.

Bona Vista turns your backyard into a summertime oasis

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

"We do everything we can to help people create a living room outdoors," explains Jennifer Gannon of the family business, Bona Vista Pools.

Now in its 40th year, Bona Vista 416-645-6980, which has completed more than 3,500 commercial and residential projects, is launching Bona Vista LeisureScapes, a retail store committed to providing the custom accessories necessary to transform your backyard into a beautiful oasis for outdoor living.

Gannon, proprietor of LeisureScapes, is passionate about expanding into new and exciting territory while still maintaining a fundamental connection to Bona Vista's traditional pool construction and service business.

Bona Vista LeisureScapes carries products geared to yards with and without swimming pools, such as acrylic hot tubs and outdoor fireplaces, as well as furniture and carpets. Garden accessories, modular systems and a lab for testing pool and spa water are also part of the product mix.

The Gannon family is committed to creating personal outdoor sanctuaries, custom designed to realize the vision of each customer's paradise.

Of particular recent appeal are plunge pools, lap pools and the more modern negative-edge pool. Like a wading pool for adults, a plunge pool is especially common in small urban yards and offers the therapeutic and aesthetic benefits of water without the costly footprint.

Lap pools are generally 75 long by 10 feet wide and are tailored to training for competitive-minded swimmers.

The negative-edge pool uses deliberate elevation and a trough system to create the illusion that the water is flush with the grass, cascading over its borders and bringing true depth to ground-level.

Increasing globalization has brought a myriad of international influences to the consumer's doorstep, and many people want to recreate travel experiences and landscapes in their own backyards. Bona Vista Pools tries to accommodate this trend through the development of custom-designed products that suit the desires and tastes of each client.

Bona Vista has also responded to a growing concern for the environment by searching for green solutions to backyard choices. Solar-powered heating systems, two-speed pumps equipped with timers to prevent unnecessary energy expenditure, and thermal insulation tactics are all being incorporated into the company's attempt to go green. This environmental consciousness extends from natural, enzyme-based products all the way down to recyclable packaging.

Bona Vista Pools works within the often harsh reality of Canada's weather by attempting to maximize the potential of this country's limited sunny months. As Canadians embrace the possibility of spending time outdoors, Bona Vista LeisureScapes realizes the importance of that extra room outside and seeks to incorporate people's dreams into the creation of a personal backyard oasis. www.bonavistapools.com

Consignment shops have some good deals

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Lynn Albert, owner of the Elegant Garage Sale (416-322-9744) started her consignment business 29 years ago, following a four-year stint as chair of the Hadassah Bazaar.

"I saw a need for people looking to buy quality items at reduced prices," she says.

"I made a decision. I told my sons, 'Boys, we're going to open a store.' My husband [the late Harvey Albert] gave us $1,500 start-up money. We made it back in a day and a half, and we've never looked back."

Her three sons, Michael, Kenny and Richard, were in high school at the time. She says the money they made from the business was to cover her pledges to various charities and to pay for down payments on the boys' first homes.

Three locations and eight grandchildren later, Albert says the Elegant Garage Sale is still going strong, but the boys have long graduated to their own businesses. Her business has been located at 1588 Bayview Ave., south of Eglinton Avenue, for almost 20 years.

"Nobody has the deals that we have," Albert says. "We get the best and the most beautiful. We get pieces that suit kids in their first homes, and we also appeal to dealers and decorators."

She says she offers value and so the merchandise moves quickly. "We're selling a $14,000 sterling set for $4,900. That's a barometer for what our prices are like. You can get a magnificent armoire for under $2,000."

The company, which offers a 60/ 40 split in favour of the customer, picks up the merchandise, Albert says. "I promise a realistic price."

Like Albert, Wendy Teperman, is a long-time veteran of the consignment field with some 20 years experience in the business. Today, she runs Contents for Homes (905-881-6666) a 5,000-square-foot store at 94 Doncaster Ave. in Thornhill, Ont.

"Things change daily," she notes. "As long as the items are good quality and in good condition, we take anywhere from antique country to modern."

She says she has a trained eye and so she can look at pictures to see whether she wants to take an item.

She says certain things retain their popularity. "I'm always looking for mahogany and cherry bedroom and dining room sets. People are also looking for teak furniture.

"There's a demand for these kind of pieces at reasonable prices."

She adds that nice writing desks go quickly and older vanities are getting rarer. Teperman has a "wish book" in which people write down what they're looking for, and there's lots of browsing, she adds. "People like wandering around.

"There's lots to look at – china, knick-knacks, lighting and artwork… We have a little bit of everything, sometimes more of one style than another. It changes from day to day."

She carries pieces from the turn of the century, such as buffets and armoires, to modern. "The pine furniture is great for the cottage."

She says she does take some upholstered furniture, but it must be in very good condition. As for pricing, Teperman says she has a trained eye. "It's just being in the business all these years."

She's also very flexible, she says. "Bedroom and dining-room sets can be split. We're very easy to work with. Everything is negotiable." She can help the client arrange for transportation of the item and the sale is a 50/ 50 split.

Teperman also does content sales and probate appraisals. Visit her website at www.contentsforhomes.com.

Another popular consignment shop stocking high-quality preowned furniture and home items is Of Things Past (416-256-9256) at 185 Bridgeland Ave. The business was started 12 years ago by Sharon Jacobson, Doreen Levitz and Nushy Vuksinic.

Jacobson says Levitz , an interior designer, came across the idea in Florida. She was visiting a consignment shop in Boca Raton, where designers shopped for exclusive pieces. "When she saw the shop, she said, 'We could use this in Toronto.'"

The three women formed a partnership, dividing up responsibilities: Levitz does the merchandising; Vuksinic, a bookkeeper, takes care of administration; and Jacobson, who has background in advertising, is in charge of of publicity and the showroom layout.

They started with a 4,000-square-foot store. Today, the business is housed in a 22,000-square-foot showroom near Dufferin Avenue and Highway 401. "We had a lot of word of mouth," Jacobson recalls.

Two years ago, Of Things Past opened a second showroom in the same premises for exclusive higher-end pieces.

She says the big draw is that the items for sale are at lower than retail prices. "Our mantra is: from one fine home to another… We take everything from antique to contemporary."

She says she has three main criteria for accepting items. "They have to be good quality, good design and fit today's market. You might have an amazing white lacquer bedroom set you paid $30,000 for, but white lacquer is not in demand.

"Your furniture has to fit what's current."

Jacobson says many people are looking to consign their furniture and other items. A lot of business is conducted by e-mail, but items are priced when they are seen. The consigner get 55 per cent, while the store takes 45 per cent of any sale, she adds.

The company also has a sliding pricing system. The prices gets reduced over time as a means of turning over merchandise, Jacobson says. "The initial price lasts for 60 days and then the item is reduced 15 percent the next month.

The prices goes down an additional 10 per cent every month thereafter. Prices may even be further reduced after six to eight months.

"The consigner can take their item back at any time, but most things stay with us until they sell."

Advice to home buyers: know thyself

By DAVID COLLIN
CJN Staff

Know all the rules before playing the game.

Whoever said the purchase of a home is the biggest investment a person can make took the easy way out with such a simple statement. The amount of research, emotional control and financial liquidity involved is conveniently left out.

Three years ago, I thought buying the right first car was challenging, confusing and financially draining, and in retrospect, I can say it was true. Now, after absorbing advice from experts, attending two industry events and having read through and collected numerous articles on how a first-time home buyer is to enter the market, I can tell you this: know thyself and what you want.

Magazines and newspaper advertisements are full of developers enticing prospective buyers and investors to pre-register for their phase previews. At the events, various brokers claim that they can put you on a list of invitation-only developer sales events. Do not believe everything you see and hear. Pre-register for the preview events yourself. Do not be surprised, however, to find that when you arrive for your appointment, you will be the only one to view what the sales centre has to show. Expect to find that when the sales centre on your list of development possibilities opens its doors to the public, the remaining units will be in short supply and the prices for what is left will leave you breathless.

Lobby of Gramercy Park

Private garden courtyard

I was told that my approach as a first-time buyer of a condo, yet to be built, is what others should emulate.

Familiarize yourself with the industry lingo and then evaluate the locations within the city that provide a quality of life and comfort that will satisfy your daily needs. If at all possible, study plans on development websites prior to preview openings so that you know the exact unit and the configuration that will best suit your ideal living-space setup. Remember, you will likely live there for three to five years, so you had better like what you end up with.

Finally, if you will be carrying a mortgage, make sure you sit down with a mortgage specialist well in advance. Plan for a suitable down payment if there will be any at all, find out what all the extra costs are and recalculate the approximate final purchase price. Know whether or not you will be able to carry on some enjoyment of life beyond your impending financial obligation.

The investment world is governed by rules much like anything else. Taking that next big step requires a full understanding of those rules and how you can play by them. The journey is long and arduous, and certainly not as clear cut as some people would have you believe, especially if they have not involved themselves with every aspect of the purchase experience from beginning to end. So know thyself and the rest will come in time.

Patio, tree establish blissful coexistence after decades of discord

By SHOLOM WARGON
CJN Staff

Some time after my wife and I purchased our home, we discovered that the patio on the northeast corner of the house had been laid directly on the sprawling root system of a massive Norway spruce tree, some 50 feet high and eight feet in girth. The result? Wholesale upheaval and undulation, culminating in a six-inch "peak," where the tree's foot-thick primary anchor root had lifted the 65-pound concrete patio slabs resting on it like so much dandelion fluff.

The solution? Remove the slabs, raise the entire patio by an average of four inches of new sand – graded from a one-inch increment at the south end to a seven-inch increment at the north end abutting the tree – and rebuild with random flagstone. The alternative – cutting into the beautiful root system that had predated our arrival by more than half a century – was not an option in our books.

At the same time, we also had to excavate and build a connecting walkway, plant a strip of violets between it and the garage, and rebuild the crumbling rear garage door sill, patio perimeter base and patio roof support posts, which on close inspection we discovered were quite literally hanging by — actually, sitting on — a thread.

After countless summer mornings, evenings and weekends of lifting, schlepping, digging, pickaxing, raking, measuring, mixing, setting, drilling, sawing, hammering, nailing, screwing, stapling, cutting, chopping, chiselling, compacting, cursing, and generally eating dust, I was really starting to get the hang of walkway and patio building.

Along the way, I encountered a myriad of impediments that I hadn't envisioned at the outset. To cite but one, I had to hand-chisel several deep notches in the four by fours anchoring the new perimeter base to allow them to nestle snugly over the roots they encountered. At the same time, the upper surface of these four by fours had to follow the north-south and east-west slopes of the new patio surface. This was necessary both for esthetics and to allow water to drain away from the house.

The trials and tribulations of the undertaking could fill a book. Here are the broad strokes:

BUYING: Countless trips to building supply stores for all the tools, materials and fasteners I thought I'd require and many I never dreamed I'd need.

STAKING AND GRIDDING: A network of some 20 layout lines was required to establish the proper north-south and east-west slopes. Ensuring consistency across the entire network covering one continuous surface – the patio and the connecting walkway — proved particularly tricky. Throughout the process, I repeatedly moved, restaked, adjusted and tweaked the layout lines to ensure this consistency.

DIGGING: Excavating 150 square feet of walkway to a depth of eight inches and digging out the patio's perimeter in order to rebuild its foundation.

SCHLEPPING: Four cubic yards of moisture-laden clay soil and six cubic yards of sand are a lot to shovel and wheelbarrow around a property. Prying up, lifting and carrying the 72 original 65-pound concrete slabs was child's play by comparison. All in all, I moved some 15 tons of material – portions of it multiple times as dictated by space constraints, learning on the job, and simple lack of foresight.

CUTTING AND NOTCHING: Good cedar four by fours for the perimeter base; scrap two by fours and one by fours for spacers to keep the two-by-eight composite walkway borders exactly two feet apart both top and bottom before laying the sand base between them; and good one by fours to finish the patio perimeter base.

LAYING: 450 square feet of landscape fabric, tacked in place with six-inch plastic spikes and stapled to the walkway borders and patio perimeter base.

Building green shouldn't make you blue

By VERA GILLMAN
CJN Staff

We received the news with anticipation and trepidation. Our cottage on Georgian Bay was about to be hooked up to the nearest town's water system. Anticipation, since much of our cottage weekends are typically spent with my husband reprimingthe pump and worrying about the ever-shrinking bay that holds our shore well or me frantically looking for buckets to catch rainwater before it makes its way inside. Trepidation, because for 17 years we have enjoyed our cottage life, despite its inconveniences, and like many cottagers, were uneasy about the inescapable so-called improvements to the area.

Russ and I both agree, however, that change as the area might, this locale has an undeniable hold on us. Our family, admittedly, would be much happier with a reliable source of water and more room. So the promise of water when needed and more frequent visits from our kids was the impetus for our idea to add space to our existing cottage.

Building in our part of cottage country has been rampant, but doing so with an eco-conscience, so far, has not been the norm. So Russ and I hoped to show that the decision to renovate, and to do so with an emphasis on keeping environmental impact low, could coexist. We would hire and buy local, replace inefficiencies with energy-saving options and use the greenest viable building supplies. That was the plan.

A renovation can create tremendous upheaval to its surroundings. Reflecting on what originally drew us to the area: existing trees, wildlife and neighbours; charged us with burdening them as little as possible.

Russ and I would consider our future needs and wants and then adopt a less-is-more approach since projects tend to grow. We hired an architectural technologist who shared our vision. She helped us with our plan to retain as much of the old cottage as was sound to preserve its charm and avoid new where old would do.

To minimize our impact, we kept the original footprint, building up instead of out, committed to not felling trees and chose a design and colour that blended with the natural setting. ReStore, Habitat for Humanity's retail outlet, was called to take all of the reusables, leaving only some wood siding, which we recycled for indoor use.

We were thinking outside the reduce-reuse-recycle box, and words like research, redefine and relax made their way into our eco-building lexicon. A multitude of decisions lay ahead and our research proved to be both friend and foe. The old adage, "the more you know, the more you realize you don't know" applied.

Buying Energy Star appliances, upgrading insulation and windows to current R-rated values, fans for cooling, low-voltage lighting and low-flush toilets was straightforward enough, but the task of exploring and concurring on some of the other alternatives turned out to be much more daunting.

Russ was happy with our decision-making process so far. Me… not so much. Why? As the one who was truly immersed in all the eco-research, I fought pangs of guilt each time our final choice didn't measure up to what I began to call my "alleged" eco-standards. The following account epitomized some of our "greenish" building scenarios.

Our kitchen countertop was a challenge. My search for natural, non-toxic, recycled material remained elusive. Our younger son, Jamie, an integral part of our building crew, told us about a countertop option that sounded like it fit our vision. It was made of soapstone, a beautiful, natural product that needed no toxic sealant. It sounded encouraging. A trip to the supplier, where a husband and wife team, artist and salesperson, excitedly invited us to their soapstone yard to view and hopefully choose our own new slab, proved productive. Never having had the granite experience, this was new to us, and intoxicating. We found the most beautiful stone with a magnificent aqua quartz vein running through it, which, the artist assured us, would be the pièce de résistance of our renovation. We were sold and enamoured with our choice. So then why, asked Russ, did I need to know exactly how the soapstone got there and who might have been impacted along the way?

The buyer proudly recounted the story. What I heard went something like this.

Soapstone, like other natural stone is quarried. The quarries are small, more like underground bubbles. Geologists, in Brazil in their case, go to farmers and request permission, I guess, to check their fields for evidence of soapstone. If they find it, farmers are paid, presumably a fair wage, for allowing the soapstone to be extracted, and the earth replaced, of course, without any environmental damage. Then labourers haul these gargantuan slabs, with I suppose the aid of modern equipment, onto trucks, where drivers then gingerly negotiate the treacherous mountainous drive to the city, I gather safely. It is then crated and shipped to various suppliers… oooh, the carbon emissions.

Did we use soapstone? Yes. Is it beautiful and natural? Yes. Do you need to use toxic sealants? No. Am I perfectly content with the choice? Not perfectly, but I'm learning that green comes in a variety of shades.

Greenest options are not necessarily most budget-favourable, readily available or suitable. Many more eco-options are being developed, but current information and regulations can be cryptic, and the lingo and looks from the naysayers… intimidating. Our efforts to be green, if not entirely successful, were good intentioned and honest and we did get an education. Our most valuable lesson was learning to relax with our choices because building green shouldn't make you blue.

We make sofas right here.

LEVELLING, PLUMBING AND SUPPORTING: By means both conventional (box and line levels) and unorthodox (the iron bars used to keep the walkway borders plumb until I could buttress them on the outside with hard-packed clay soil).

PAINTING: Three coats – high-gloss paint for the white portion of the new perimeter base, sealant for the natural red portion.

GRADING: Once the layout lines were in place, the sand had to be raked and compacted to match their level and slope.

All of the foregoing took me to the end of October, at which point I decided to hire a stonemason to ensure that the job would be completed before winter. That gentleman was most helpful in selecting the stone, which he agreed to lay and set at a good price based on the entire base being graded and ready for laying, so that no additional work would be required on his part.

Throughout the process, our magnificent spruce loomed over the proceedings like a giant mastodon prepared to scuttle, with a flick of its big toe, my efforts at the slightest sign of further encroachment. But it was also benevolent, allowing me to use its farthest-reaching broad root as a natural border for the walkway and lead-in to the patio. For its part, the variety of random flagstone my wife chose has lived up to its name ("Rainbow") by showing its full colour when wet, ensuring sunny spirits come fair weather or foul.

STILL MASTER OF ITS DOMAIN and breathing easier now, our spruce spreads its limbs in welcome.

MacKenzie Ridge and Upper Thornhill estates

Townwood Homes is now showcasing Upper Thornhill Estates and MacKenzie Ridge, two sought-after new communities featuring classic detached homes on 42-, 60- and 70-foot lots in the city of Vaughan.

Upper Thornhill Estates will be surrounded by nature in all of its splendour but will still be close to city amenities. It is set amid rolling hills, quiet walking paths, lush trees and parks – a setting of natural beauty, with places to walk, hike, bike and explore in all the four-season magnificence that Vaughan offers.

Vaughan, "the city above Toronto," is one of the Greater Toronto Areas's most affluent communities. This upscale city continues to experience exceptional growth and offers wonderful amenities such as parks, shopping centres, schools – both public and private – theatres and more.

Upper Thornhill Estates is the ideal place for families to live – in homes that offer spacious layouts, fabulous kitchens and magnificent family rooms.

Exclusively crafted by Townwood, these detached homes are situated on 42-foot lots. Priced from the upper $500's, these stunning homes will range up to 3,170 square feet.

The homes will be showcases of modern technology and environmentally responsible construction. Townwood's Eco-Eclipse Program will provide complete energy efficient features for the energy-smart consumer and will make the homes of Upper Thornhill Estates one-of-a-kind residences.

Townwood offers purchasers their choice of either the Signet or Estates series.

The Signet series boasts an impressive list of features, including nine-foot main-floor ceilings, an oak main-floor staircase, Silestone kitchen counters, strip hardwood flooring and Manor House garage doors, as well as $7,500 in free upgrades.

The Estate Series comes with additional energy-saving upgrades, as well as nine-foot second-floor ceilings and extended-height basements. It also offers a spectacular upgrade package that features built-in stainless appliances by Wolf, Sub-Zero and Asko, upgraded kitchen cabinets, Berber carpeting, and Regency hardwood flooring and cultured marble counters.

At Townwood's MacKenzie Ridge in Maple, Ont., classic estate homes are set amid lush trees and gently rolling hills. These stately 60- to 70-foot-lot homes are priced from the upper $700's and boast inspired interiors and kitchens with Wolf and Sub-Zero built-in appliances.

The sales office for MacKenzie Ridge and Upper Thornhill estates is on Dufferin Street in Vaughan, north of Major MacKenzie Drive. For more information, please call 905-832-5202 or visit www.townwoodhomes.com.

The big move – to a downtown condo from the 'burbs

By GARY LAFORET
CJN Staff

It was early in May, a crisp, sunny day with a cool east wind in the harbour. As we sailed past the Toronto Star building, I handed over the tiller, ducked into the cabin for my cellphone and called my wife at our new home.

"Hi, Hon. Look out the kitchen window. Can you see us? We're really flying."

While that day was smooth sailing, selling your home in the suburbs and moving to a new condominium downtown can present some challenges across the financial and emotional spectrums.

Various concerns shifted in and out of focus during the long delay between the offer to purchase and the final closing, but primarily my wife, Raylyn, and I struggled with two recurring questions: even though our three children are grown, will we fragment our close family feeling if we move from our house in Guildwood Village in east Toronto? Secondly, are we doing the right thing financially?

Raylyn's major worry evaporated after the first, big, raucous family dinner at the new place. With more open space, and a newly purchased larger dining room table, it actually seemed better suited. Cupboard and counter space in the kitchen proved adequate when put to the test.

North view

Financial and logistical planning began with the offer to purchase and continued through the closing. It helped somewhat that we had faith in the developer of our condominium. Ours was a Lanterra Development partnered with H&R Developments and Malibu Investments Inc, an Israeli developer. We found them to be very professional throughout the process. We had also familiarized ourselves with the project's declaration so we knew what to expect, to some extent.

The timeline

March 29, 2003: Raylyn and I put a deposit down on a one bedroom and den near the top of 18 Yonge St., a 39-storey tower to be built at Yonge Street and Lakeshore Boulevard. The plan is to use it as a "cottage in the city." We'd keep our rather elderly 26-foot sloop at the Toronto Island Marina.

East view

Feb. 13, 2004: We upgrade to a two-bedroom corner unit on the same floor. After repeatedly scouting our future neighbourhood, exploring Harbourfront and St. Lawrence Market, we had decided that this is where we'd like to live full time someday when we are so-called "empty nesters."

Sept. 15, 2005: Our projected occupancy date. Despite Raylyn's somewhat unreasonable entreaties to me to "get them to build ours first," our floor to be is literally thin air. Our new occupancy date is Dec. 18, 2006. We predict it will be finished February of 2007. That's okay, more time to get ready; more time to sock money into the condo fund. To be fair, building permit delays had been a problem.

Dec. 11, 2006: Our pre-delivery inspection, "PDI day." The builder's rep lets us into our future home, and Raylyn instructs me to start looking for flaws. I nod dutifully and then begin staring transfixed through the kitchen window at a freighter steaming through the east end of the harbour. My harbour. I get into even more trouble a few minutes later when she discovers that I've brought my camera – just one – and am snapping more pictures of the harbour and the lake beyond through the master bedroom window and vistas of the city through the living room windows.

Okay, I didn't find any good flaws, I guess, but I was distracted.

Dec. 18, 2006: Occupancy date arrives. The builder's second prediction was accurate. This began a kind of limbo period in which we lived in the condo but kept the house for 10 more months before we were sure that the kids wouldn't need it. John had taken one look at the new place and abandoned the house to move into the second bedroom. Originally, he had been looking forward to his plan whereby he would forsake living in residence to look after the house while he went to University of Toronto.

Aug. 15, 2007: The building was registered in July, and we were able to close several weeks later. Our most recent graduate, Jessica, announced that she was moving to her own place in September and no longer needed the house. We listed it 10 days later and sold it with a late October closing.

Luxury condo tower in the downtown core

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

The L Tower is an icon to live in.

Reaching 205 metres into Toronto's skyline, the 57-storey L-shaped condominium building holds 496 suites and was designed by renowned architect Daniel Libeskind, known for his design of the Royal Ontario Museum's Michael Lee-Chin Crystal.

The skyscraper has a number of unique elements, including panoramic views of the downtown core and Lake Ontario. The building is framed around the Sony Centre for the Arts (formerly the Hummingbird Centre) at Yonge and Front streets.

People looking for a condo in a busy neighbourhood with restaurants, galleries, shops and theatres should consider the L Tower. It is steps away from the St. Lawrence Market and is linked to the new Heritage Awareness Centre, an extension of the Sony Centre for the Arts. The centre consists of an interactive culture museum; ArtsLab, a studio theatre showcasing fine arts, drama, dance, literature, architectural and screen presentations; TVDinner, a dinner theatre; CyberSpace, an eatery with an open gaming facility; and CityLink, a tourist information centre that promotes city and provincial attractions. In addition to these services, it sells tickets to events and provides a concierge service.

The L Tower has luxurious spa facilities with treatment suites, his and her wet and dry saunas, a yoga studio, a lap pool, a state-of-the-art fitness space and a lounge area.

Each unit has engineered hardwood in the foyer, a living/dining room, kitchen, interior bedroom and hallway. It comes complete with a Miele stainless steel kitchen appliance package and stainless steel exhaust hood; a granite kitchen countertop with choice of porcelain, ceramic or mosaic tumbled marble backsplash; a marble countertop in the master bathrooms with porcelain sinks; and a Miele laundry machine and dryer.

Building amenities include a catering kitchen featuring two glass upper cabinets; a private dining room; library; cinema and resident's lounge.

L Tower is a short walking distance from a TTC subway station and is well serviced by taxis.

Living quarters range from 43 to 157 metres squared and have nine- and 10-foot ceilings. Suites start at $589,900 and occupancy date is slated for 2011.

For more information about the L Tower, call 416-777-2533.

Moving downtown was a great decision

While the whole timing sequence in which we owned two homes for more than 10 months was less than efficient, we wouldn't have had it any other way. Raylyn remarked the other day that she thinks we see our kids – two of whom work downtown and use the TTC – more than if we had stayed in the house. It's true. Raylyn has lunch with Jessica three or four days a week, John stops for dinner most nights "on his way home" to his new apartment, and Jennifer comes in from Brooklin, Ont., frequently for theatre or concert nights, or just to drag Dad to the gym in our building.

Raylyn now walks to her office in 10 minutes or less. If it rains, she walks through the PATH, a network of pedestrian tunnels under the downtown office towers. She heroically volunteered to give up her car, which saved purchasing a second parking space at $20,000 back in 2003… it's a lot more now. Not having the overhead on a second car covers maintenance fees on the condo. The suburbanesque Subaru Outback was traded in for a more nimble Mini. It sits idly in the garage most weekends because we find we walk everywhere downtown. Unfortunately, we are often walking to restaurants. (Just kidding, Dr. P.)

It goes without saying that you are sacrificing square footage if you purchase downtown, and that was of some concern to us. At around 900 feet with a very good split two-bedroom layout, our new place is like a bungalow in the sky with nine-foot ceilings and floor-to-ceiling windows. We opted generally for modern condo-friendly furniture, including low-backed couches that don't block the windows and the views.

We have two storage lockers, which is recommended for anyone moving from a house. With no basement and no garage, there is a limited clutter forgiveness factor. Of the whole experience, ensuring that sentimental treasures moved with us while clutter didn't was probably the most challenging and time-consuming task. For instance, my three copies of the last issue of the Toronto Telegram newspaper didn't make the move; artwork and cards from the kids through the years did.

More importantly, our family as a unit came through what Raylyn and I saw as a necessary "shift in gears" very nicely. Our new place is hardly an "empty nest" and it never will be. The goal was change and more vibrant surroundings, and it's happened.

What do I miss and what have I learned?

I do miss – especially in the winter – being able to point our rotund Pug Kasey in the direction of the backyard. I do know my condo neighbours and enjoy talking to them. I do know I should sedate myself before attending any more condo annual meetings. I do wish they'd stop "testing" various alarms in the building. I am happy that the kids come by as often as they do – even if my son makes me go on four-mile walks through the city.

I do think we made the right decision and, most importantly, I know Raylyn thinks so, too. This is good because, what I know for sure is, I am not moving again.

Feds to fund program commemorating St. Louis

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The government of Canada has agreed to fund a memorial and an education program dedicated to the St. Louis, a passenger ship with more than 900 Jewish refugees from prewar Europe that was denied landing in Halifax.

At least one-third of the ship's passengers were killed during the Holocaust after being turned away in May and June 1939 by Canada, the United States and Cuba, its original destination.

Canadian Jewish Congress has been lobbying for a memorial to the St. Louis for 20 years and will receive $300,000 to design a memorial in Halifax harbour as well as develop a teachers' kit. The instructional material will facilitate the education of young people about the consequences of a racist immigration policy, said Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

Congress has proposed erecting a memorial at Pier 21, where immigrants most often arrived in Canada, he added.

The St. Louis grant is part of a $29-million Community Historical Recognition Program announced last week by Jason Kenney, secretary of state for multiculturalism and Canadian identity. The Indo-Canadian community was granted $2.5 million to commemorate the 1914 Komagata Maru incident, in which a ship

The News in Brief

CANADA

Israel Dep't Planned

TORONTO — To mark Israel's 60th birthday, the Canada Christian College is creating a department dedicated to studying the Jewish state, the college said this month. President Charles McVety said the first chair will be Frank Diamant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, whom McVety said has a "wealth of first-hand experience and insight into the Diaspora Jewish community and its relationship to the Jewish state." The department, which will serve both graduate and undergraduate students, "is a powerful symbol of the extraordinary working relationship and devotion of the evangelical movement with the modern State of Israel and the Jewish People throughout the world," McVety added.

Relief Fund Launched

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada has established an emergency relief fund to assist the growing number of victims of the cyclone in Burma, as well as last week's earthquake in China's Sichuan province. To donate, visit www.bnaibrith.ca, or call 1-800-274-2310.

WORLD

Still More Threats

TEHRAN — Arabs and Iranians would destroy Israel if they got the chance, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said. "The criminals imagine that by holding celebrations they can save the Zionist regime from death," the Iranian president said May 14 as U.S. President George W. Bush arrived in Israel for its 60th birthday. "They should know that regional nations hate this fake and criminal regime, and if the smallest and briefest chance is given to regional nations, they will destroy it."

Shooter Called Insane

SEATTLE — Naveed Haq was insane when he opened fire in the Seattle Jewish Federation in 2006, a witness said. Dr. James Missett, an addiction and forensic psychiatrist, testified last week that Haq was and is severely mentally ill, and was legally insane at the time of the shooting. Haq, 32, killed one woman and injured five people, then told police he wanted to make a political point about Jewish power. Haq's lawyers will continue to question medical experts about his diagnosed bipolar disorder and chronic psychosis this week. The Muslim-American was taking six drugs for his mental illness at the time, including one not approved for bipolar disorder that has homicidal side effects in some patients, an expert said. He also suffered from schizoaffective disorder, which includes hallucinations and delusions.

Meat Plant Raided

DES MOINES — U.S. authorities say a methamphetamine laboratory was operating at the nation's largest kosher slaughterhouse, that employees carried weapons to work, and that some 80 per cent of its workers were illegal immigrants, including rabbis who had entered the country from Canada without proper documents. The charges were among the most explosive to emerge following the massive May 12 raid at Agriprocessors in Postville, Iowa. In a 60-page search warrant application, U.S. federal agents revealed details of their six-month probe of the factory that involved 12 federal agencies. Some 390 workers were arrested on immigration violations. The plant's rabbinic supervisor, Moses Weissmandel, denied the drug charges.

Rescuer of Warsaw Ghetto Children Dies

WARSAW — Irena Sendler, who smuggled thousands of Jewish children out of the Warsaw Ghetto to safety, died May 11 in Warsaw. She was 98.

Irena Sendler

Between October 1940 and April 1943, Sendler and a team of about 20 volunteers smuggled out about 2,500 children in boxes or suitcases. She then placed them with Polish families. As a social worker, Sendler, who was Catholic, visited the ghetto regularly.

She was later arrested and tortured by the Gestapo.

In 1965, she was among the first people named by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations. She also was made an honorary Israeli citizen. Sendler was nominated last year for a Nobel Peace Prize.

She lived in relative obscurity until about eight years ago, when a group of students from Kansas learned about her wartime heroism and wrote a play about it. The play has been performed in North America and Poland.

Hundreds of people attended her May 15 funeral, including Poland's chief rabbi, Michael Schudrich, who said a prayer, and Israel's ambassador to Poland, David Peleg.

Immigrants struggle to forge a community connection

'Imperative that they become involved in the fabric of Jewish life'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Gabriel Epelbaum, who came to Toronto from Argentina four years ago with his wife and two children, got involved in the Jewish community by helping other newcomers.

By becoming part of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto's Gordie Wolfe Leadership Development Program for newcomers, he said that he is not only giving back to the community, he is getting back as well.

The Epelbaum family is among the one-third of 180,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto Area who identify themselves as immigrants.

Joanna Sasson Morrison, co-ordinator of community development services at JIAS, said that the leadership program, one of a number of JIAS programs, was established as a response to the situation of immigrants not sitting on community boards despite making up one-third of the community.

"It is imperative that immigrants become involved in the fabric of Jewish life. The community needs a [bank] of talented people from which to draw," she said.

Janis Roth, JIAS executive director, said that the agency has always been the gateway to immigration, but its role has changed over the years.

"Eighty-five years ago, its role was all about settlement – assisting with food and shelter. The focus now is getting people connected with the community. Without that, we would have a disengaged, unaffiliated group. If we offer more when they arrive, the [community benefits]."

There is no longer a framework within which all immigrants fit, she said. "We now work closely with each family to determine their goals and dreams, and we work from there. It is much more individualized. There is no notion that each family needs 'this and this and this.'"

Morrison said that there are more "spokes on the wheel.

"While before it was linear, with each family needing basically the same things, now

Two new encyclopedias

From the editor's desk

One of the chief characteristics of the Jewish people through the ages has been our deep inclination towards learning.

Indeed, each morning, at the very outset of our prayers, as we prepare to contend with the rigours of the upcoming day, the traditional liturgy directs our minds and our hearts to a number of blessings related to learning.

Study (of Torah) is considered the transformative equal to a range of socially desirable behaviours that our rabbis urged us to pursue. They knew that study and learning would, of its own motion and integrity, lead the student to adopt those very same behaviours of his or her own accord.

Achad Ha'am, one of our people's great thinkers and commentators of the last century, was quite emphatic that the gravitational pull exerted on the Jew by the need to learn has been one of the key factors of Jewish continuity throughout the centuries.

"Learning, learning, learning," he wrote to the American scholar, Rabbi J.L. Magnes. "That is the secret of Jewish survival."

Were he alive today, Achad Ha'am (Asher Ginzburg, as he was born) would undoubtedly be very pleased with the recent appearance of two new, unprecedented encyclopedias – new aids to Jewish survival – that enhance the already vast possibilities of more learning by and about Jews, if not precisely more Jewish learning.

The Jewish Women's Archive and Shalvi Publishing have produced an electronic encyclopedia called Jewish Women: A Comprehensive Historical Encyclopedia.

Edited by professors Paula Hyman and Dalia Ofer, of Yale University and Hebrew University, respectively, the encyclopedia is available only in CD-ROM format. Hebrew U professor Alice Shalvi (a contributor to The CJN's Rosh Hashanah supplement last fall) is the encyclopedia's associate editor.

The work is a watershed achievement in making pertinent, instructive scholarship accessible to vast numbers of curious and interested students. It is a superb resource and an inviting portal for further investigation of the many entries in the work.

Those entries span three millennia of the women of Jewish history. The encyclopedia includes some 1,700 biographical entries, 300 thematic entries and more than 1,400 photographs.

The encyclopedia brings to the fore and makes readily available knowledge and information about hundreds of Jewish women who were known, if at all, only to a few in the narrower, esoteric world of academic research and scholarly study.

Now, whoever is curious may acquire the knowledge. The encyclopedia is an inviting modern, highway of easily travelled interconnections: cross-references, glossaries, essays, articles and helpful visual aids.

If Jewish Women: A Comprehensive Historical Encyclopedia is not available at the nearest Jewish bookstore, contact Shalvi Publishing Ltd, POB 3828, Jerusalem. The e-mail address is mosheshalvi@israsrv.net.il

Yale University Press has just released The YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe. Edited by Gershon David Hundert, Leonor Segal Professor of Jewish Studies and professor of history at McGill University, the two-volume encyclopedia is a stunning, magnificent, weighty work of some 2,400 pages.

It is the combined, masterfully produced product of an editorial board consisting of 34 scholars and more than 450 contributors, whom Hundert describes as "virtually every major and senior scholar [in] their areas of expertise." The work contains an index of more than 200 pages, maps, colour plates, countless photographs and of course, entries upon entries regarding the Jews of eastern Europe.

In the preface Hundert writes that the work was intended to. "[reflect] all aspects of Jewish life in its variety and multiplicity: religious and secular; male and female; urban and rural; Hasidic and Misnagdic; Yiddishist and Hebraist; Zionist and assimilationist; Russian and Polish; Romanian and Ukrainian; Lithuanian and Galician; even Karaite and Rabbinite."

Hundert explains the encyclopedia's genesis, aims and methods in a seven-page preface. Conceived some 10 years ago, he explains, the encyclopedia owes its existence to the single-minded collaboration of a number of dedicated and highly motivated individuals and generous sponsors.

The encyclopedia "is intended for anyone interested in the history and culture of Jews in Eastern Europe." That encompasses a very wide sweep of Jews and non-Jews alike.

We are all the beneficiaries of this significant collaboration directed so ably by Prof. Hundert.

people come in on different places along the continuum."

In the 2001 Census Analysis Series on the Jewish Community, prepared by Charles Shahar and Tina Rosenbaum in 2005, it states that JIAS provides resettlement and integration services, as well as an array of programming, including orientation to Toronto and its Jewish community; financial assistance; English lessons; children's and youth programs; and vocational counselling in partnership with community and government-sponsored agencies.

Boris Shorfer

The integration of newcomers can be further enhanced, they said, by providing opportunities "for participation in the breadth and scope of Jewish community life through camping and day and supplementary school attendance; Jewish community centre and synagogue membership; and by taking leadership roles within community agencies and organizations and on communal boards and committees.

"It is important to recognize the enormous contribution made by newcomers to the overall strength, vitality and viability of the community. Moving forward, the community will sustain and further its efforts to welcome, support and integrate newcomers as they adapt to Canadian society and become fully participating members of our community."

Epelbaum, who works as a project engineer, and his wife, Silvina, who runs a day care, admit that immigration is not an easy process.

"It wasn't difficult to find a way to make a living, but being Jewish can be very expensive. That is true in any country, and I understand. We have to help institutions supplement themselves," said Gabriel Epelbaum.

His older son attended the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for one year on a subsidy, he said, but left because it was difficult for him socially. "That was the main reason he switched schools. He was the one of the only Latin Americans at CHAT, and everyone had friends from their previous school. I admit that he is shy, but the school made little effort to help him out."

Nina and Meir Shenhav
[Carolyn Blackman photos]

Nina and Meir Shenhav have been here for about nine months and are still looking for work. She is a journalist, author and actress, and he is an electrical engineer. They are the parents of a 12-year-old and an eight-year-old. They were offered a "generous" subsidy for their children to attend Associated Hebrew Schools, but turned it down, they said, because they want them to integrate with the larger community.

"We came here," said Nina Shenhav, "because we wanted to move beyond our own community, shake up our life a little. We want our kids to make an effort, to learn to swim in the deep water."

Their lives are calmer and more relaxed here, they said, and they realize now how tense they were in Israel.

"Our social lives are different, though. In Israel, our families lived nearby, and the kids popped in and out of everyone's home. They miss that. It is harder for them to make friends here. They keep in close touch by computer, but it is not the same. You can't get a warm hug from a computer," she said.

They would like to get involved in the Jewish community they said, "but now is not the time. We have to network for jobs and help our kids get settled."

They're also learning their way around. "We need to learn how to find a doctor, get to the pharmacy, the library, things we always took for granted in Israel."

Boris Shorfer, 43, a father of two, and a member of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, arrived here from the Soviet Union via Israel when he was 14. He still remembers how difficult it was to fit in socially. "I had left all my friends behind, and I was angry for at least two years."

He has visited his birth town, he said, and realized how good it is to live here. "It is a country with a lot of anger. My parents did a brave and smart thing to move."

Arkadiy Teplitskiy, 24, who has been here more than three years, and his wife Julia, 24, who arrived several months ago, are both working, and agree that life is definitely easier here.

"We work and we can spend our money. In Russia, we could hardly pay our rent. It's a good step. We miss Russia, though, so we try to enjoy ourselves and forget," said Arkadiy.

Work takes all their time, however, and they have no time to forge a connection to the Jewish community, they say.

Igor Korenzvit, who moved here from Russia in 1973, is chair of the Jewish Russian Community Centre and a member of The CJN's editorial advisory board.

He agreed that the resettlement of immigrants is not the big problem any more. "Some take longer, some take shorter. What is the problem, is their integration into the larger Jewish community, and that is what we need to concentrate on."

With about 40,000 Russian Jews in the Greater Toronto Area, they represent about 20 per cent of the Jewish population, he said, but less than one per cent sit on boards of Jewish institutions.

The problem, he said, is that many in the larger Jewish community believe that Russian immigrants will integrate on their own if we give them time.

"It happened in the past when their grandparents came [from eastern Europe], but their grandparents were educated in Judaism, and they knew about traditions and religion.

"Russian Jews know very little when they come. Tzedakah did not exist in Russia, and if we don't teach them, the next generation will be completely lost."

At the JRCC, he said, we try to teach them about Jewish values, and "afterwards [we hope] they'll move on to attending synagogue."

In general, he said, Russians are highly educated and hard-working. "They could strengthen the Jewish community.

"We have more to lose than they do if they don't integrate. We need new blood and new thinkers."

The sorrow and shame of a hypocrite's deceit

Last week was a momentous one in Israel. Scores of dignitaries – current and former heads of governments, nobel laureates, scholars, thinkers, leaders of industry and science, writers and celebrities from all walks and spheres of life – were in the country to take part in a special 60th anniversary conference, called Facing Tomorrow, convened by President Shimon Peres under the auspices of the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute in Jerusalem. The celebratory occasion and the august roster of participants burnished the gathering to a high shine of possibility, hope and aspiration for the future.

To commemorate the 60th anniversary, U.S. President George W. Bush addressed a special session of the Knesset. Fresh from a visit that day to Masada and fully aware of the mountain fortress' symbol-laden significance in Jewish history, the president proclaimed that "Masada will not fall again." The moment was electric with emotion. "I am proud to be Israel's closest ally and best friend," he told the assembly.

On the same day, Mahmoud Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority (PA), addressed his people in commemoration of al Nakba when Palestinians mourn, as a "disaster," the founding of the Jewish state. He urged Israel to honour its 60th anniversary by making peace with the Palestinians. "There are two peoples living on this beloved land. One celebrates independence and the other feels pain at the memory of its Nakba… Isn't it time for Israel to respond to the call of a just and comprehensive peace and achieve historical reconciliation between the two peoples on this sacred and tortured land?" (Our emphasis)

Seldom have so few words carried greater hypocrisy and deceit.

At every turn by Israelis and international mediators of the wheel of attempted coexistence, Palestinian leaders, if not all of the Palestinian people, have jammed the spokes. As recently as 15 years ago, and ever since in Oslo, Washington, Wye Plantation and Camp David, Palestinian leaders have spurned peace and reconciliation with Israel.

Seldom have leaders abused their own people more than the Palestinian leaders have abused, harmed and betrayed the Palestinians. How many billions of dollars given to the PA by Europe, the United States, other Western countries and the Gulf states, intended for state-building, have Palestinian leaders squandered or simply stolen?

Typical of Palestinian leaders' behaviour toward Israel was the launching, the day before Abbas spoke, of a GRAD rocket at a shopping centre in Ashkelon, wounding some 90 people.

These Palestinian leaders tried to do in Ashkelon what their confederates have always tried to do since even before Israel was formed: kill Jews, and the possibility of peace with a Jewish state.

Isn't it time for Abbas to speak the truth to his own people about the real cause of their pain? It is both a shame and deep sorrow for them that he does not.

Democracies should denounce Durban II

According to The CJN, The Canadian Council on Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) has given up trying to get accredited to Durban II, the upcoming conference that's allegedly about human rights ("CIJA blocked from Durban II, May 8). I don't know why they tried in the first place.

It should be clear to anyone that the United Nations has lost all understanding of what human rights are, and that its agency on the subject, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, is little more than a vehicle for denouncing Israel. All western democracies and any Jewish organizations should follow the lead of Canada and have nothing to do with this upcoming travesty.

Perhaps, the well-known defenders of human rights who are organizing this event (Libya, Iran, Cuba, etc.) could invite that nice former U.S. president, Jimmy Carter, as a keynote speaker. Carter could then proclaim again that if only Israel and its supporters would talk to those nice, misunderstood folks of Hamas, there would be peace in our time!

Conservative synagogues and USCJ

In ending their affiliation with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), a move that is out of step with other conservative congregations in the rest of Canada, several Toronto synagogues are isolating themselves and depriving their membership of benefiting from the vast array of services that the USCJ provides to its affiliated congregations ("Beth Emeth leaves Conservative umbrella body – follows Adath Israel in ending USCJ membership," CJN Toronto, April 24).

While the leadership of these synagogues assert their ongoing commitment to Conservative Judaism, it is troubling that they do not feel it incumbent upon their congregations to assume their share of the responsibility of supporting, by way of dues, the very infrastructure that works on their behalf, and whose raison d'etre is to empower and enrich its affiliated congregations by ensuring that there is a strong, unified and dynamic body to represent, sustain and grow a pluralistic Conservative Judaism.

What message is the leadership of these synagogues conveying to their members, and to all of us as individuals, regarding the importance of communal responsibility, the significance of affiliation, and about the notion that one must not only receive, but also give?

Can our relationship with the bodies that maintain and ensure the continued existence of an infrastructure for Jewish life in our communities be based solely on a short-term, monetary cost-benefit formula, or rather, should it be based on a long-range vision that recognizes the value of that infrastructure and the necessity of contributing toward its sustainability, not only for the present, but for the future benefit of our children and children's children?

I am organizing a reunion of child survivors who were in the "International DP Children's Center Kloster Indersdorf" in 1945-46. The "boys" from Kloster Indersdorf who will be coming to the reunion this summer keep asking me whether I can't find more of the "girls" who were with them in this displaced persons' camp. Female survivors are hard to find, because most of them have probably changed their names.

Here are nine names of "girls" whom they are hoping to see again at the reunion:

- Halina Bryks, born about 1930
- Margot Krakauer, born about 1930
- Nina Krieger, born about 1932
- Jaceta and Laia Rajnsztajn, born about 1931 and 1927,
- Magda Rozsahegyi, born about 1930,
- Sinaida Grussman, born about 1937
- Nelli Jussen, born about 1930
- Suri Lachmanovivz, born about 1931

Please contact me if you are one of these survivors or know any of them.

Re-branding Israel

Consul General Amir Gissin understands full well how "to help re-brand Israel on the world stage" ("Our joy is always connected to tears," CJN, May 8). As long as Israel occupies the West Bank, illegally expands settlements, illegally builds the security barrier, kills innocent non-combatants, and creates a living hell for Palestinians under its control, no amount of mere spin-doctoring will help.

We who truly love Israel know that "positive images" will be seen once these egregious acts cease. Israel must stop double dealing, stop pretending to seek peace while travelling the same old paths of dishonour, immorality and death.

Telling the stories of Canadian Jewry

By FRANKLIN BIALYSTOK and RANDAL SCHNOOR

B.G. Sack. Louis Rosenberg. A.M. Klein. Miriam Waddington. Mordecai Richler. Naim Kattan. Gerald Tulchinsky. Irving Abella. Pierre Anctil. Janice Rosen. Norman Ravvin. Some of these names are familiar to many Canadian Jews, others less so. They are representative of Canadian Jews who have recorded the history of Canadian Jewry and who have penned the literature of our people in Canada, in English, French, Yiddish and Hebrew since the turn of the last century.

Some of these writers, scholars and archivists, together with local and national Jewish leaders, established historical societies that have kept alive our stories and records across the country. At the forefront of this effort is the the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies/Association des études juives canadiennes. Its history and achievements have made a major impact in our understanding of Jewish life in Canada. As the association celebrates its 32nd. anniversary from June 1 to 3, 2008, at the Congress of Humanities and Social Science (Congress) in Vancouver, it is pertinent to recall its important contribution to our community.

The association sprung from the Canadian Jewish Historical Society (CJHS). It was founded in 1937 in Montreal, in part to document, award and organize the "history and life of the Jews in Canada in general, and in Canadian regional centres in particular, as well as with the history of the Jews as an [sic] historical people." Sack, who wrote the first comprehensive history of Canadian Jewry in Yiddish in 1926 was the president, and H. M. Caiserman, who was the driving force for the creation of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) in 1919, and its rebirth in 1933, was the secretary. At a meeting the following year, Saul Hayes gave a reading of "The Crisis of 1849" and its impact on Jewish merchants in Montreal. Hayes was soon to become the director of Congress, a position he held for the next 40 years. Little is known about the fledgling society after that. Most likely, it folded due to the tremendous strains of the oncoming world conflict and the unsuccessful efforts to persuade the government to open our doors to the Jews under Nazi oppression.

Although local Jewish historical societies thrived from coast to coast, we don't pick up the threads of the CJHS until the 1960s. In the intervening 30 years, literature by and about Canadian Jews had become widespread, especially in Montreal and Winnipeg. Klein, arguably the most profound Canadian Jewish thinker, had written poetry, essays, political commentaries and a seminal novel. Irving Layton, Mordecai Richler and Leonard Cohen were in the first rank of Canadian writers as were Prairie-bred Adele Wiseman, Waddington and Eli Mandel. In 1964, the "governing principles" of the reborn society surpassed those of its predecessor, encouraging university students to explore their Jewish heritage, an indication of the social mobility of Canadian Jewry in postwar years. Yet, without proper funding and a link to the national mainstream, the society became moribund by the end of the decade.

Thankfully, this situation was soon reversed. Hayes, disturbed by what he coined "the Jewish emptiness," where young Canadian Jews had become divorced from their traditional prewar institutions and knew little of their past, spearheaded the re-establishment of the CJHS under the aegis of CJC. The society's president, Victor Sefton from Winnipeg, was joined by other visionaries, such as landsleit Abraham Arnold and Harry Gutkin, in inaugurating the new society at the Congress at Laval University in 1976. Now that the society was linked academically and to CJC, it was able to sponsor programs, publish newsletters and organize an annual conference highlighting the best of new scholarship. Yet, the members and participants were largely "amateur" historians and writers. Canadian Jewish studies, as an academic field, was still in its infancy. Thus, the driving force of the society were the leaders of local historical societies.

H.M. Caiserman, secretary of the Congress of Humanities and Social Science, left, and David Rome, who was to become the director of the Canadian Jewish Archives, return to Canada after completing a fact-finding mission to Poland immediately following the end of World War II. [CJC archives photo]

The Winnipeggers were joined by such significant stalwarts as Ben Kayfetz, the director of community relations for CJC and a historian of Jewish Ontario, and David Rome of Montreal, the director of the Canadian Jewish Archives and a luminous historian of Jewish Quebec.

A major factor in the rising profile of the society was the inculcation of the study of Canadian Jewry in the universities. In the 1980s, academics were undertaking the formal study of our history and culture. One impetus for this interest was the publication of None Is Too Many, by professors Harold Troper and Abella. The authors uncovered the anti-Semitism prevalent in the Immigration Branch in the 1930s and through World War II that prevented European Jewry from finding refuge in Canada. The impact of their work was profound in exposing the anti-Semitic and racist nature of Canadian society at that time. Subsequently, other scholars have looked at various aspects of that period and have branched out to examine our history since 1760. Many professionals joined the existing conclave of learned "amateur scholars" in the society, and together they created a unique blend of inquiry into the story of Canadian Jewry.

The creation of the Canadian Jewish Historical Society Journal in 1977, a periodical edited by Rabbi Jonathan Plaut and later by Stephen Speisman, the pre-eminent historian of Jewish Toronto, provided an outlet for new and established researchers. With its demise in 1988, the society realized that there had to be a shift in its outlook.

In the early 1990s, there was much discussion, nay dispute, among the membership of the society. Some felt that the work should be devoted solely to history; others argued that our focus had become too narrow, and that to attract new interest, we had to expand our outlook to sociology, the arts and other disciplines. The latter group's perspective prevailed. With a grant from the Social Science and Humanities Research Council, a new journal, Canadian Jewish Studies/Etudes juives canadiennes, emerged. Its editors have been professors Richard Menkis, Ira Robinson and Michael Brown. To date, there have been 12 issues. By 1996, the CJHS had changed its name to the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies/Association des études juives canadiennes.

During this transition, Kattan, whose novels weave a thread from his native Baghdad to his adopted home in Montreal,,succeeded Abe Arnold as president. Kattan was the first, and so far the only francophone, to head the association. His successors have been professors Robinson, Troper, Ravvin and Randal Schnoor. The importance of Canadian Jewish studies has led to the establishment of Chairs in the field at York University, inaugurated by Abella, Concordia, headed by Ravvin, and Ottawa, led by Anctil. Courses in the field are now offered at the University of Toronto (Franklin Bialystok), and UBC (Menkis). Morton Weinfeld (McGill University) and Schnoor (York) teach courses on the sociology of North American Jewish life.

The ACJS/AEJC is a national organization with headquarters in Montreal and is a constituent organization of Canadian Jewish Congress. We gratefully acknowledge the ongoing support of the Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies at Concordia University. The association is also affiliated with the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, the Jewish studies program at the University of Toronto and the Vered Jewish Canadian Studies Program at the University of Ottawa. The association maintains a close affiliation with historical societies and archival collections in Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa and St. John.

The association recognizes its debt to the pioneers of Canadian Jewish studies. In the 1960s, it established an award for lifetime achievement. It was named in honour of Caiserman and, fittingly, its first recipient was our first important historian, Sack. Today, the award is named after our first demographer, Rosenberg, who compiled an analysis of all the communities that had at least one Jewish resident in the 1930s. Recent recipients have been historians Abella, Tulchinsky and Cyril Leonoff. This year's recipient is Seymour Levitan of Vancouver for his work on fostering Yiddish culture in Canada.

Today, the association profits from the contributions made by its members and by the research presented in the journal and at the annual conference. The field of Canadian Jewish studies now encompasses all of the social sciences and humanities. In recent years, ground-breaking work has been achieved in a number of areas and disciplines, such as women's studies, Yiddish translation and literary criticism. Norma Joseph, Rebecca Margolis and Ruth Frager are among the list of scholars writing on the contributions of Canadian Jewish women. Pierre Anctil, a francophone fluent in Yiddish, has translated the writings of early Montreal Yiddish writers into French. English translations have been done by numerous scholars, including Vivian Felson, Mervin Butovsky and Robinson. Ravvin and Michael Greenstein have written cogent analyses of our great writers.

The association relies on the efforts of our members. We are especially indebted to Rosen, the chief archivist of the Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee National Archives in Montreal, for creating the core for research by a growing number of scholars, students, and lay people. Bernard Katz is our authority on our governance and finances, and Robinson continues his stellar contributions in a myriad of ways.

The association's primary goals remain the same as that of the founders in 1937: recording our history and culture, educating Canadians, and a commitment to telling the story of Canadian Jews. We invite you to be part of this journey.

For information on the association visit www.ACJS/AEJC.ca, and for information on the conference, visit www.jewishmuseum.ca /info/currrent events/acjs-event.

Franklin Bialystok and Randal Schnoor are respectively the vice-president and president of the ACJS/AEJC.

Balancing now and later

Gratitude, known as hakarat hatov (acknowledgment of the good) is a key concept in theological and human terms.

When properly understood and engaged, it roots us in the present and gives meaning to our daily lives. Even when things are troublesome, there is much to be grateful for. It's more than a mere "the glass is half full" aphorism. It's about being settled in this life. It's about living in the now, as modern psycho-babble would have it.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Too often we ignore the present for future gain or vision. We live for the end of the rainbow and don't see its present magnificence. Earning money for a child's future is important, but perhaps not more important than reading a story tonight. So many of us wait for graduation, vacation, when the kids grow up, etc. But when the kids are grown, they are gone. We miss the daily interaction, the full level of love and, yes, irritation that makes life so full and worth living. Now.

Don't wait eagerly for the terrible twos to be over. Try to see the joy, the fun and the silliness that's built into that phase. Life is to be engaged in now. Struggle with it – don't sleep through it! See the good as it appears, and be grateful for that life and that relationship. Seize the day!

Nevertheless, living for the present is not sufficient. A future-looking vision is equally engaging and necessary. We advance forward, hoping for progress, expecting some form of future achievement. Never satisfied with the present, we constantly push ourselves to do more, planning for the next 10 or 20 years, seeking a future that is better for our descendants.

In Jewish terms, we are commanded to guard, protect and improve the world. Looking to the future is part of our mandate. What will my life be like? How can I improve it and help others? These are critical questions that we must keep asking and expanding. Never satisfied with the present, we plan for the future.

There is a dynamic tension between this sense of present awareness and forward planning. It is suitably illustrated in a talmudic story of Shammai and Hillel. Shammai ate in honour of Shabbat. If he found a good chicken, he saved it for Shabbat. Hillel lived each day for itself, blessing God day by day. Both modes of existence are available, and even recommended, in our tradition. Finding the balance between present consciousness and future pursuit is the goal.

My grandson is about to celebrate his bar mitzvah with two great-grandmothers over 90. I am grateful for this great good. Dayeinu. I also feel a powerful desire to be present at his child's bar mitzvah (B'H).

Finding room for all under the Conservative tent

Recent decisions by some Toronto synagogues to leave the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ) have been news in this paper for several weeks, and obviously the issues have been brewing for much longer than that.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

This columnist can make no comments about those actions. They clearly have resulted from a long process of declining relationships between the congregations and the USCJ. It saddens me to see major, significant members of our denomination pull away from a central body – but whatever the causes, I'm sure the decisions were not taken lightly.

However, I would like to think out loud about denominational affiliations and what I think a viable relationship among members of a denomination could be.

Let me start with us ordinary folk, the members of a synagogue. What do we expect? Many of us expect that our synagogue and clergy will be there for us for our significant life-cycle events: brit milahs, baby namings, bar/bat mitzvahs, weddings, funerals, shivahs and unveilings. in other words, birth-to-death ceremonies.

We also expect that three times a year – on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur – we will spend hours in shul listening, and maybe even participating in, long and complex services. We expect, at all these events, a sermon that will uplift us and guide us (at least until we leave the sanctuary). I should add that we usually expect beautiful cantorial and choir music.

We also want our children to have a good Jewish education. Perhaps that takes place at a day school rather than a synagogue school, but we want a synagogue school to provide the best in Jewish learning. We expect a youth group to shepherd our teens through the temptations of high school.

(What the klei kodesh expect from us in return I can only guess.)

What does our synagogue then expect from its umbrella organization? This is less clear. Certainly, from a body like the USCJ we can expect its guidance when we seek to employ a rabbi and cantor. That's been my shul's immediate need in the past few years, and I'm happy to report that we received excellent candidates and have made what I believe are excellent choices who will grow our congregation and serve us well, whatever demands we make on them, for many years to come.

However, I realize that for many congregations, decisions regarding our denominational stances on matters of women's roles and the ordination of gays and lesbians, among other things – in other words ideological matters – have caused divisions. Some individual congregations don't subscribe to the same interpretations that the central bodies now accept.

As a synagogue board member, I hereby submit my wish list for central movement bodies.

First, provide proof that we get value for our dues. This would include providing major speakers from the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) – free of charge, please – who would come on a regular basis to hear us and be heard on issues confronting our denomination, and indeed all Jews, in the 21st century.

Second, and perhaps more importantly for the long-term health of our movement, provide a way – this is the 21st century, after all – to communicate with lay members of our congregation in meaningful ways. For example, I get the weekly JTS Torah study via e-mail. Are there not other ways to educate us on what we are about, rather than just knowing that the other denominations either scorn our leftish ways or think we are too conservative?

Finally, and most importantly, give us the spiritual nourishment that we need to survive and thrive as a movement. Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel wrote most luminously about the ways that we human beings can begin to think about concepts of holiness, about the relationship between the divine and the mundane, about the care that the Creator gives to this creation, and about the need of the Creator for that creation – ourselves.

Think of the schools of Hillel and Shammai. While they came to opposite conclusions about many halachic issues, they still married each other's children and ate at each other's tables. Surely under the umbrella of the Conservative movement, we can eat at each other's ideological tables and share our commonalities and our commitment to Halachah, while at the same time agreeing to disagree under the same tent.

Or would that be too miraculous?

A visit to Auschwitz

Like many readers of The CJN, I have always felt a profound and special sensitivity to the horrors of the Holocaust. That dark experience has become etched into the fabric of Jewish history and into our very make-up.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Although I am not aware that any of my relatives were murdered by the Nazi killing machine, like most Jews, I am still deeply touched by this horrific chapter in our recent history. In terms of its magnitude, the Holocaust is, sadly, the lowest point in a history of hatred, repression and discrimination that has marked Jewish life.

I recently delivered an academic paper in Krakow, not far from Auschwitz-Birkenau. Although I knew it would be difficult, I felt it was necessary to visit first-hand that place of monumental nightmares. Auschwitz, that symbol of unprecedented evil, was also witness to the survival of a people that has suffered so much throughout history.

I had been warned that Auschwitz, now designated a museum by the Polish government, was a common tourist attraction, and I was prepared to see offensive sights and inappropriate behaviour by tourists who might lack the sensitivity appropriate for such a monument. On my visit, such offensive sights were minimal and did not prove to be a disturbance to the sanctity of the memories of those who suffered and perished on the site.

I felt that I knew what to expect when I went there. Images of Auschwitz are not new to me. But those images could not capture what it felt like to walk under the foreboding entrance sign "Arbeit Macht Frei," to stand on the very ground where the horrific selection process of new arrivals occurred, to visit the cold, harsh barracks where so many people suffered horrible living conditions. It is impossible to describe the feelings that flooded over us as we heard descriptions of the forced slavery, were reminded about the operations of the gas chambers and crematoria and walked through empty buildings that were once witness to unspeakable inhumanity.

We were accompanied on this visit by a survivor of Auschwitz. As our group moved from one location to the next, she became overcome by her memories, and she spoke of the terrifying and brutal experiences she endured there as an 18-year-old.

We felt anger, not only at the perpetrators but also at those who knew about and could have done something to retard or put a halt to the events that transpired. How could this have happened? Why did the Allies not bomb the railway tracks preventing the death trains from reaching those camps? Why were more people not saved? At the end of a six-hour visit, as the sun was setting and the guide had gone for the day, 20 Canadians stood in the dark in the nether corner of Birkenau and recited Kaddish. It was the least we could do.

We repeatedly heard from the guides and others that the Poles suffered terribly under the Nazis. Unfortunately, there was also some denial of anti-Semitism or complicity on the part of the Polish people. Historical facts as well as the evidence of recent anti-Semitic graffiti in Krakow reminded us of reality.

But the message is clear. There are some measures we can take to prevent future holocausts, starting with the work we do at home. We must continue to fight against the propagation of hate and ensure that purveyors of hate and violence are held accountable for their wrongdoing.

We must support Israel as a refuge and a symbol for Jewish freedom and self- determination. We must stand ready to stop genocide and hatred wherever it occurs in the world. With all the violence and turmoil occurring in some parts of the world, it appears that the lessons that should have been learned from the Holocaust have been forgotten.

We all hope that a better world will emerge from the darkness of Auschwitz and Birkenau. We should observe each Yom Hashoah and every day in between, reminding the world of the potential of evil. At the same time, we must march forward and lead humanity to that better world. We owe this to those who suffered so much.

The Kirshner File

Zionist movement was aided by Palestinians

It goes without saying that Palestinian Arabs were opposed to Zionism. But from the moment they mounted a concerted campaign to fight it, the Palestinians split into two warring camps, much to the benefit of the Yishuv, the Jewish community in Palestine.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The mainstream camp, led by Mohammed Amin al-Husseini, the grand mufti of Jerusalem, could not reconcile itself to the Zionist project, whose ultimate goal was Jewish statehood. The accommodationist camp, which was identified with his bitter rival, the Nashashibi family, was pragmatic and open to co-existence with the Zionists, believing that they were simply too strong to be defeated.

This divergence of views had major ramifications. The accommodationists, largely consisting of regional leaders who had forged ties with the Yishuv and resented Husseini's intransigent leadership, aided the Zionists politically, economically and even militarily. When nation-wide fighting broke out in November 1947 and escalated after five Arab armies invaded Israel in May 1948, two important developments occurred, both of which tilted the balance of power in favour of Jews.

First, relatively few Palestinian Arabs joined the armed struggle to throttle the Yishuv. Second, in violation of national leadership edicts, some Arab villages reached non-aggression pacts with their Jewish neighbours.

Not surprisingly, Palestinian scholars have glossed over this sensitive topic, and strangely enough, many Israeli historians have made light of it. Hillel Cohen, an Israeli research fellow at the Truman Institute for the Advancement of Peace at the Hebrew University, tackles it head on in a path-blazing book, Army of Shadows: Palestinian Collaboration With Zionism, 1917-1948 (University of California Press).

Cohen is familiar with the broad terrain of the subject, having written two related books, The Present Absentee: Palestinian Refugees in Israel Since 1948 and Good Arabs: The Israeli Security Service and the Israeli Arabs. Cohen's current work, based on declassified Zionist, Arab and British archives, illuminates the issue.

As he points out, Zionist diplomacy only seriously began to consider relations with the Arab inhabitants of Palestine following the British occupation in 1917. Until then, the Zionist movement concentrated on cultivating ties with the Ottoman Empire, which ruled Palestine, and currying favour with European powers such as Britain, Germany and France, which had vital interests in the Middle East and might be of help in furthering the Jewish cause in Palestine.

The Balfour Declaration, issued by the British government on Nov. 2, 1917, galvanized the Palestinians, prompting them to form nationalist organizations, mount anti-Zionist demonstrations and carry out attacks against Jews.

In response, Zionist leaders – spearheaded by Chaim Margaliot Kalvarisky, a land purchaser for the Jewish Colonization Association, and Col. Frederick Kisch, a retired British intelligence officer and head of the Zionist executive's political department – devised a counter-strategy. Chaim Weizmann, the president of the World Zionist Organization, was also involved in this campaign.

Underpinned by the naive assumption that an authentic Arab national movement in Palestine did not exist, it sought to create a co-operative Palestinian leadership, deepen already existing fissures in Palestinian society by fomenting conflict between Christians and Muslims, and develop a cadre of Palestinian newspaper writers to laud the advantages of co-operation with Zionism.

The Palestinians who chose co-operation were driven by various motives. Some assumed that the Zionist movement was an arm of the British Mandate and, therefore, should be cultivated. Still other Palestinians, particularly land dealers and job seekers, were animated by personal gain. Palestinians who considered themselves nationalists but who were opposed to the Husseini leadership were also targeted by Zionist strategists. Palestinians who had Jewish friends and who were repelled by the violence of Palestinians also tended to favour co-operation.

With this in mind, Kalvarisky established the Muslim National Associations, a loose network of Palestinian political parties. But the concept did not work, and after more than a decade, he abandoned the idea altogether.

Playing on old animosities, Zionists courted Bedouin tribes, which at first did not identify with the Palestinians. Indeed, some Bedouins regarded the Palestinian national movement as a threat.

Efforts to recruit the Druze of Mount Carmel were undertaken as well. Officially, the Druze community remained neutral, but in practice, Druze fighters drifted into both the Jewish and Arab camps. As for Christians, they played a marginal role in developments.

Zionists tried to shape Arab public opinion by subsidizing Palestinian newspapers in Jaffa and Jerusalem and by recruiting writers who would sing the praises of Arab-Jewish co-operation and brotherhood. But as Cohen suggests, this strategy was only partially successful.

A Jew and a Palestinian Arab in conversation, circa 1940

Since land purchase was a key objective of the Yishuv, Zionist agents cast their gaze at Palestinian landowners, such as the Abu Ghosh family, and absentee Arab landlords residing in neighbouring countries.

Palestinian nationalists tried to block these transactions by various means. Yet by 1948, the Zionist movement had succeeded in buying seven per cent of the land in Palestine.

Palestinians bitterly opposed to such transactions did not sit quietly. In 1925, the first fatwa forbidding the sale of land to Jews was issued. But as Cohen observes, it was left to the British to impose effective restrictions on land sales.

On another front, the Zionist movement tried to recruit Palestinian public figures and informers. The first Palestinian Arab accused of collaboration, a village elder from the Mt. Hebron area, was murdered in 1929. The mayor of Haifa, Hasan Shukri, a symbol of co-existence, survived an attempt on his life.

The Zionist movement attempted to forge economic links with the Palestinians, since they constituted a natural market for goods produced in the Jewish sector. But with the 1929 riots, the Arab Executive Committee declared an economic boycott, calling on Palestinian consumers to buy solely Arab products.

Shortly after the United Nations passed the 1947 Palestine partition resolution, the Higher Arab Committee, headed by the Husseini clan, issued a declaration urging Palestinians to continue the boycott and "to consider any connection with (Jews) as a severe crime and a great betrayal."

Arabs were strongly urged to take up arms and fight for the homeland. Yet during the 1948 war, the majority of able-bodied Palestinian men did not heed that call. In some cases, village elders refused to allow Arab fighters to deploy in their villages.

As the war raged, Arab informers provided Zionist intelligence operatives with valuable political and military information, Arabs turned over British police stations to Zionist forces and Arab merchants sold food to Jews.

It was also not uncommon for Palestinian Arabs to sell weapons to the Zionist side. These arms merchants sold their wares to the Haganah and the more militant Etzel and Lehi militias, their only motive being profit, Cohen says.

Israel won the War of Independence due to a number of compelling factors, notably superior military organization and higher morale.

But as Cohen notes, covert Palestinian co-operation with the Zionist movement was certainly a contributing factor in Israel's seminal victory.

HEALTHY NEVER TASTED SO GOOD

CMDA hosts gala to buy scooters

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Driving through the crowded and narrow streets of Israel's major cities can be a daunting task for the ambulances of Magen David Adom (MDA), the country's national emergency and blood service.

Between the traffic gridlock and incessant stream of pedestrians, even the sound of a blaring siren doesn't guarantee a free path to whatever emergency has arisen.

To help reach patients safely and on time, MDA is starting to build up a fleet of 100 three-wheeled ambulance scooters.

And the Toronto Chapter of Canadian Magen David Adom (CMDA) for Israel is doing its part by hosting an upcoming gala evening to raise funds for the purchase of several scooters, which cost $25,000 each.

"The scooters can maneuver quite easily through the streets," notes Iris Ehrent of CMDA.

"They are fit with all of the first aid and emergency equipment needed, including a defibrillator and portable oxygen tank, and can get to the scene of an accident before the ambulance arrives."

The gala, which will also celebrate Israel's 60th anniversary, will be held on June 5 at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Featuring MC Harvey Atkin, comedian Deb Filler and the musical talents of violinists' Daniel and Carey Domb, the evening is slated to be a fun-filled affair.

Organizers expect 600 people to attend the occasion, which will include a special sponsor's reception.

"It's a way to say thank you to our supporters by giving them a fun evening, where they can relax, laugh and enjoy the music," says Ehrent.

"At the same time, we are trying to educate people about the importance of what we do, what we want to achieve and where funds will be allocated."

With 650 ambulances, first aid stations across the country, a large corps of skilled volunteers and being the provider of all blood plasma services to hospitals and Israel's Defence Forces, MDA is critical to the nation's well-being.

CMDA has been supporting it since 1976 and there are fundraising branches in the United States, South Africa, Great Britain, Mexico, as well as other places.

Ehrent describes MDA as Israel's "second line of defence" and notes that because the emergency service does not receive funds from major Jewish organizations, donors are "their lifeline.

"Our hope is that proceeds from the gala will enable us to purchase 10 scooters," she says.

"We also need to help with funding the ambulances, which cost $20,000 each per year, to maintain, insure and fully equip with medical supplies."

For tickets to the gala, phone 416-780-0034 or email cmda@interlog.com.

Business leaders offer advice at federation event

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Richard Wajs truly believes in the old adage, "It's not what you know, it's who you know."

"I am amazed when I meet people, how many don't market themselves properly," the executive search consultant told UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's second annual Taking Care of Business conference last week.

Wajs said people don't use networking to their advantage. "Have you worked to develop a relationship with someone in [your] industry? People aren't proactive enough. Go to meetings and work the room!"

The day-long program took place May 4 at the Sheraton Hotel downtown, with about 300 people in attendance. Panels focused on the real estate business, entrepreneurial insights, and Israeli investing, among other topics.

Wajs moderated a panel titled "Hiring Trends: Positioning Yourself for the Future" that included Rick Chad, president of the recruitment firm Chad Management Group; Steven Pezim, managing director of Bedford Group/Transearch, a search firm, and Daniel Weinzweig, managing partner of Searchlight, a media and entertainment firm.

Pezim noted that "Green issues" are becoming much more important for generations X (tail-end baby boomers born in the 1960s) and Y (the children of baby boomers), in terms of what the companies they work for are doing, or not doing, for the environment.

"But not baby boomers, who are happy to get jobs and happy to keep them," Pezim said.

As much as employees want to be comfortable with their company's actions, Chad said it's also important for employers to recognize the good works of those who work for them.

"I would say it's good to pat people on the back now and then and let them know how much you appreciate them."

A panel titled "Now That's Entertainment" included Jordan Banks of JumpTV; Mark Breslin, owner of Yuk Yuk's comedy clubs; Aubrey Dan, president of theatre company Dancap Productions; and Michael Moskowitz, president and CEO of XM Canada, the satellite radio network.

Banks described how he rose in the corporate ranks after growing up with a single mother in Scarborough who struggled to make ends meet. A few key essentials helped him make it to the top. "There is no substitute for hard work. Today, that has rung true for me," Banks said.

Other elements of success include maintaining an ethical character.

"You only have one reputation, so you better make it good, because it will last a whole lot longer than you. It speaks to your integrity, honesty and the way you treat people," Banks said. "And be careful whose butt you kick on the way up, because it might be the same butt you'll be kissing on the way down."

Richard Wajs
[Dave Gordon photo]

Though hard work might breed achievement, he was quick to say that work isn't everything.

"Success in life is not all about money. It's about family and community success."

Breslin spoke of his own success, coming from humble beginnings. He boasted that Yuk Yuk's is the world's largest chain of comedy clubs, the first of which he opened 32 years ago in Toronto.

"The difference between me and my esteemed colleagues is that Yuk Yuk's did not start out as a business. Accident has played a major role in my life, and a certain desire of the power of negative thinking. I grew up thinking I knew what I did not want to do. I did not want to work. I wanted to play."

After graduating with an English literature degree, he said he entered the "real world" without knowing what career path he would take. His inspiration came when he realized he knew a fair number of comedians who happened to be Jewish.

"I was very aware of wanting to give a Jewish voice and culture to this city. It was a kind of Presbyterian culture in this city, a place that needed an enema, and Yuk Yuk's could be the nozzle."

On the heels of what he describes was the "age of counterculture," his club pushed limits.

"It was sex, drugs and rock and roll. We kept the sex in and the anger in."

Despite about one-third of patrons walking out mid-show when the club first opened, Breslin said Yuk Yuk's eventually built up a following.

Dan also touched on the theme of risk-taking, noting that, this summer, his company will be bringing the musical Jersey Boys – based on the career of the singing group the Four Seasons – to Toronto.

The venture to reinvigorate the city with more large-scale, Broadway-type shows is a much-needed gamble, he said, adding that the dearth of theatrical shows has a direct effect not only on tourism, but on a city's overall economic health.

Panelists discuss future of Israel advocacy

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For Israel's image to improve on the world stage, advocates for the Jewish state have to shift their focus from defending negative perceptions to promoting positive accomplishments, Israeli consul general Amir Gissin said at a panel discussion last week.

From left, Liberal MP Joe Volpe, Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee research and outreach co-ordinator Hershel Recht, The House director Rabbi Rafi Lipner and Israel Consul General Amir Gissin.

Heebonics and The Canadian Jewish News, along with the Birthright Israel Alumni Community, The House (a centre that offers programming for Jewish students and young professionals of all denominations) and Hillel of Greater Toronto, organized a panel discussion last week titled "Israel after 60 – where do we go from here?"

Gissin, Liberal member of Parliament Joe Volpe, Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee research and outreach co-ordinator Hershel Recht and The House director Rabbi Rafi Lipner discussed the future of Israel, how to combat some of the negative images that plague Israel and how Canadian Jews can become involved in Israel advocacy.

Recht began the discussion, held at The House on May 14, reflecting on the fact that the situation in Israel is constantly changing.

"Last week was a week of celebration, and this week, it has turned into Hezbollah trying to take over Lebanon, a Katyusha rocket slamming into Ashkelon… Hamas saying they are never going to recognize Israel… In a New York minute, everything changes."

He said in spite of this, we need to focus on the positives coming out of Israel.

Many Israeli accomplishments in academia and technology are known by the Jewish community in Toronto, he said, but they are not shared with the rest of the Canadian community.

Recht gave the audience of about 40 students and young professionals the opportunity to express their perceptions of what is going on behind the scenes in Israel.

One audience member noticed that when he visited Israel following the Second Lebanon War, Israelis seemed defeated. Another brought up the fact that the term "apartheid" in reference to Israel is gaining credibility.

The discussion quickly shifted to the atmosphere on many Canadian campuses where students, a woman in the audience said, either don't know how to be effectively involved or fear getting involved because of the backlash they suffer for openly supporting Israel.

"That is a big problem because of the sense of shame that is given to those who advocate for Israel," she said.

Gissin said the concerns voiced by the audience "touched" him because the diversity of their concerns is similar to that of Israelis.

"The mix of huge pride, a sense of being right, a sense of huge achievements [is coupled with] fatigue that comes from tense security situations, from a lack of belief in one government or another," Gissin said.

"There is a feeling of a lot of happiness on one hand, a lot of depression on the other and a lot of confusion in general."

But he added that he is optimistic for the future, as long as Israel, which he said is a "great product with lousy marketing," begins to present itself to the global community in a completely different way.

By changing the focus from the conflict to Israel's achievements, he said, people will start to perceive the country differently.

"The success of our adversaries is partly because they have managed to take away from us the human face. The face of an Israeli is either a tank or a soldier with a helmet."

Gissin suggested that if students are confronted about Israel, rather than talk about territorial concessions, they should present Israel as a more "attractive" way.

"Not right, attractive. We must start thinking in terms of attractiveness… Our only chance to become relevant and not be viewed from the angle of the conflict is if we become relevant to Canadians, if we bring in Israeli insights – successes and failures – in the areas of immigration, of water preservation, of high tech and gadgets, and of pop culture."

In response to Gissin's new marketing strategy to "re-brand" Israel, Volpe said, "You are what others think you to be… It is how people see you, and they see you through what you do and not what you say.

"I see Israel as a flower that developed in the desert. I see it as a success historically. As a politician, we see it and I see it, as a triumph of the rule of law.

"Canada will still be here when we're gone, Israel will be there when we are all gone, so the question is, what will you do, what will we do to make sure… that the value that others see in Israel and others attribute to the Jewish community outside of Israel are maintained with the same kind of … firmness and self-assuredness that we expect of any living, breathing, free, democratic, law-abiding individual?"

Rabbi Lipner offered his perspective on the future of Israel by reflecting on the points addressed by the other three panellists.

"The concept of change is not necessarily something that we have to try to make happen as much as we have to first realize that it can happen," Rabbi Lipner said.

Bialik honours longtime volunteer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto lawyer Joseph Steiner first joined the board of Bialik Hebrew Day School in 1984, in part because he wanted to "do something useful" aside from his day job.

On May 27, he will be honoured for his contributions at the school's Israel at 60 gala at Le Parc in Markham.

A former president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in the late 1990s and of Bialik's board from 1990 to 1994, Steiner, a senior partner in the litigation department of a downtown firm, also gives his time to the boards of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School and Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Although he has also been involved with other Jewish organizations, including Canadian Jewish Congress, his volunteer work has focused heavily on Jewish education. A former chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education (now the Mercaz) from 1994 to 1997, Steiner is also involved with the Melton Centre for Jewish Education.

As well, his wife Elaine – who like her husband has received an Ontario Volunteer Service award from the Ontario Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration – teaches at United Synagogue Day School. The two of them have studied in the Florence Melton Mini-School program and in summer programs at Jerusalem's Shalom Hartman Institute.

Joseph Steiner

"I'm really very interested in Jewish learning and Jewish text," he said in an interview in his 66th-floor office overlooking Lake Ontario. Although Steiner, 61, describes himself as "not particularly observant," he belongs to a Conservative synagogue and finds "a lot of heritage, knowledge and wisdom" in Jewish study.

Musing on the motivation for his community involvement, Steiner said it has to do with "identification" and also the example set by his father Harry and his mother Ruth, who were involved with the Labour Zionist movement and Pioneer Women (now Na'amat Canada) respectively.

"It seemed to follow very naturally, because I've really been brought up with it," said Steiner, whose parents both chaired organizations. "I found it really interesting, and quite rewarding."

It was Steiner's father who invited him to join Bialik's board when Steiner's son, Jonathan, now 32, was a student at the school. That was his first experience in the Jewish volunteer world.

A native of Toronto who attended Associated Hebrew Schools, Steiner majored in political science and economics at the University of Toronto before pursuing graduate studies at Yale University, where he received his M.Phil. in economics.

He returned to Toronto in 1975 to attend Osgoode Hall Law School.

Among the issues in Jewish education in general today, the biggest is the level and availability of subsidies, Steiner said. "Costs are only going up."

As well, he said, day school enrolment is an issue. Although the number of Jewish day schools in Toronto has proliferated in recent years, Steiner pointed out that less than 50 per cent of local Jewish children – perhaps 35 to 40 per cent – are enrolled.

"For somebody with two, three or four kids and an upper middle class income, it's still a big strain."

Steiner estimates that his volunteer commitments take two to six hours a week and, now that he is an associate member of the board of governors for the Jewish Agency for Israel, three or four trips a year to Israel.

With a work week that is usually about 50 hours long – longer when he is involved in a trial – he said that finding time for everything is just a matter of planning. "You put [volunteer commitments] in your calendar and work around them."

Program launched to strengthen Jewish identity

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concerned that Jewish communal identity is weakening, FEDERATION CJA has launched what it hopes will become a community-wide effort to reverse that decline through educational and cultural projects aimed at children and youths.

Generation J is to be an ongoing program, backed initially by $1 million in seed money from the federation, which promises to contribute a further $678,000 per year for an indefinite period.

Federation president Marc Gold and his immediate predecessor Richard Vineberg, who is chairing Generation J, describe the program as a long-term investment.

"This initiative is imperative for the survival of the Jewish community in Montreal, and I'm not overstating that," Gold said. "I'm concerned that in 10 years, we'll be a community of Jews, not a Jewish community."

However, Gold stressed that this money is being made available not as an end in itself but as a stimulus to others, whether organizations or individuals, to similarly invest in the future of the community or come up with creative ideas to make being Jewish meaningful to the young.

Generation J has already attracted about $300,000 from other sources, mainly U.S.-based foundations.

The money is to be spent, not to be used to create an endowment, although if enough funds were raised, that would be ideal, Gold said. The $1 million has come from the federation's reserves, not from the 2007 Combined Jewish Appeal. The continuing contribution of $678,000 will come from the annual campaigns.

One group that will immediately benefit from the new money is the Jewish day schools, which will receive a total of $250,000 more per year to subsidize students who don't pay full fees. This amount will be on top of the current $2.55 million the federation allocates to the schools for this purpose.

The new Academy for Performing Arts at the Segal Centre will also benefit. This is an arts education program for children and teens, being run in conjunction with schools.

Up to 230 children will be able to go to a Jewish summer camp thanks to the increased funding.

Another priority is more follow-up with young adults who have participated in organized trips to Israel, such as Birthright Israel and March of the Living. The federation is seeking to engage these young people in social action, Israel advocacy, Jewish culture and environmental issues.

> 'Imperative for the survival of the community'

New projects include:

- providing Jewish-content books and magazines to families with young children through such American-based programs as PJ Library and BabagaNewz;
- a moot court of Jewish Law to teach high school students concepts in Jewish law and their relevance to current issues;
- the West Island Jewish Learning Centre for Young Families, where families in that area can become familiar with Jewish holidays and Shabbat, and take parenting classes.

The federation is seeking to collaborate with its own agencies, as well as with schools, synagogues, camps and other community organizations in furthering the objectives of Generation J.

A total of $300,000 from the $1 million seed money is being made available to fund other ideas. Non-profit or community-based organizations serving the Jewish population in Quebec can apply for one-time grants of up to $30,000.

The new funding brings the total the federation is allocating in 2008-2009 to Jewish education, both formal and informal, and other projects that strengthen Jewish identity to nearly $10.8 million, Vineberg noted.

Although Montreal probably has one of the most cohesive communities in North America, according to such measures as synagogue membership, day school attendance and charitable giving, the federation does not think this community is immune from "the precipitous decline in the number of affiliated Jews and an alarming upsurge in rates of assimilation" being observed elsewhere, Gold said.

He sees this trend as an inevitable result of an open, pluralistic society and of a globalized, electronically connected world.

Marc Gold

He said the flexible nature of Generation J is a recognition that youth today connect with their Jewishness in different ways, and that there are, in fact, multiple ways of encouraging a sense of belonging.

Gold acknowledged that some parties may think all the money should be put into the Jewish day schools, but that would not serve the objective of reaching out to those not connected to the community in this way. Not everyone would send their children to a day school, even if cost was not an issue.

"Generation J is not a passing fad; it's a long-range commitment to change the conversation in our community about what it means to be Jewish," Gold said.

Netivot opens doors to She'arim students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Grade 6 students at the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, which serves children with learning disabilities, now have a place to go within the Jewish school system next year.

Last week, the board of Netivot HaTorah Day School approved in principle a Grade 7 program for 14 children who are in Grade 6 at She'arim, which will close in June because of financial difficulties.

It is the third of three Jewish day schools to offer a place to She'arim students, following the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Associated Hebrew Schools.

Last month, it was announced that 18 She'arim students entering Grade 8 would be housed at TanenbaumCHAT's south campus on Wilmington Avenue for a one-year program to be taught by the community high school's special education teachers.

Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin Campus in Thornhill will have a program for up to 20 She'arim children in Grades 3 to 6.

The three schools will work together to share resources for the new programs, which will constitute, "in effect, a school within a school at three educational facilities," according to a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto press release.

The federation will provide funding for the cost of education over and above the usual tuitions for the host schools, said federation spokesperson Howard English. The dollar amount is still being worked out, he added.

The long-term future of the program will be discussed after this year, English said. "The goal is certainly for these [programs] to be longer-term, as they affect She'arim kids. The programs are for She'arim kids. That's not to rule out permanent programs for children with learning disabilities, [but] these schools already have programs for children with learning disabilities."

Netivot's board approval is subject to the signing of a memorandum of understanding with federation.

"Our primary priority has always been the well-being of She'arim's students, and educating them as a group within sensitive settings that meet their unique needs," federation chair David Koschitzky said in the news release. "We commend Netivot, TanenbaumCHAT and Associated for making this their priority as well and for acting so decisively on behalf of She'arim's children."

"Netivot is proud to assist the children of She'arim and the community in providing quality, caring education in an atmosphere that is consistent with the spirit of She'arim," Netivot president Stuart Lewis said in the federation release. "We're also enthusiastic about working in close collaboration with Associated and TanenbaumCHAT, which are recognized for their high educational standards."

Most reports on Israel's 60th were quite positive

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Canadian news media gave substantial attention to Israel's 60th anniversary, much of it more positive than some might have expected, given the media's well-known predilection for emphasizing the negative.

Editorial comment is often a good indicator of the media's mood.

In "A call to courage" (May 8), the Globe and Mail reflected on the life of Yossi Harel, the captain of the famous illegal immigrant-bearing ship Exodus, who recently died in Israel at age 90. Harel, the Globe wrote, "symbolized as much as the life of any man could the hope, courage and resilience that is the story of Israel."

The editorial continued: "[W]hat has been achieved in Israel represents not only a triumph for the Jewish people but a lesson for others. The country's per capita GDP places it in the world's top tier. Its universities are world-class research institutions. In a region defiled by despotism, Israel is a beacon of freedom and democracy. In a region tainted by cronyism and arbitrary measures, Israel is governed by the rule of law. This is a day for celebration."

Still, the paper was not overly sanguine. It recognized the dangers that confront Israel, in particular from Iran, and it acknowledged also that "comprehensive" peace eludes Israel, even though the outlines of a peace agreement with the Palestinians are understood.

The Toronto Star's editorial, "Israel's 60-year triumph of hope," also paid homage to the country's remarkable achievements in its brief modern history: "The Jewish state is a vibrant democracy, a Mideast military power, the centre of a revived Hebrew culture, and a high-tech economy."

The Star showed considerable sensitivity to the political complexity in which Israelis consider their future. The paper acknowledged that while a majority of Israelis – approximately 70 per cent – support the idea of a Palestinian state, they need to be assured of their security. Yet Israelis confront a rejectionist Hamas in Gaza and endless barrage of rockets and mortars and ominous threats from Iran. The challenge remains for Israel to be able to negotiate with a reliable Palestinian partner that is capable of delivering security while, as the Star also notes, Israel needs to articulate a broad strategic vision (a point that's also made by numerous Israeli analysts.)

Editorial comment in the National Post and a wide array of CanWest papers across the country also drew attention to what Israel has achieved in 60 brief, action-packed years under conditions of hostility and conflict that might well have paralyzed most other countries in the same position.

The title of the Calgary Herald's May 10 editorial, "Existence of Israel a miracle, let alone that it's a democracy" encapsulated this assessment and was representative of views across the land.

Such views were not merely confined to editorial comment, but were also reflected in news reports such as Oakland Ross' balanced, fair-minded stories from Jerusalem for the Toronto Star, including, "Still far from peace at 60: By almost any measure, Israel is a success story," May 3; and Peter Goodspeed's "Israeli home front less of a battle front" (National Post, May 3), which managed to sympathetically capture the complexity of Israel's situation.

There were also numerous human-interest stories that looked at personal experiences related to Israel's founding.

To take but one example: CBC TV News correspondent Peter Armstrong (The National, May 8) followed up on the story of a Canadian, Milka Elner, who had moved at age 25 from Montreal to Israel at its founding. Joe Schlesinger first profiled her for CBC at her kibbutz during Israel's 30th anniversary. Armstrong found her again, now 97 and still articulate, wishing that "we should live together with the Arabs in a quieter way." Armstrong described how the kibbutz itself has changed over the years while still "clinging to its socialist roots."

Armstrong also interviewed Arieh Handler, who was also present 60 years ago at the founding of the state. Handler reflected on the long-held hope that Israel could be a light unto the nations and regrets that it has come up short.

But what nation – founded on high aspirations, yet confronted with six wars in 60 years – could have fulfilled such a mission?

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Hillel awards 'celebrate achievement'

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

The hard-working student volunteers of Hillel were able to relax at the organization's annual student awards night.

Held May 12 at Ryerson University, the awards honoured a year's worth of volunteer participation and initiatives on campuses throughout the GTA.

"This is a special evening to celebrate achievement," said Hillel board member Alan Berdowski. "There's no higher calling than the giving of yourself for something you believe in."

Berdowski, the first speaker of the evening, took time to reflect on Hillel's work during the past school year.

"We've had high-profile events," he said. "Hillel keeps growing in popularity. We've done tutoring, volunteering in Israel and community rebuilding missions."

One of the many guests at the event was Amir Gissin, consul general of Israel for Toronto and Western Canada, who congratulated award recipients on their efforts to help the Jewish community.

"Israel appreciates [your work]," he said.

Gissin said he was impressed that students gave of their time.

"You have a price to pay," he said. "Those who volunteer, the only thing they give up is time, but you are out there taking a risk. You have alternatives. You study and work and have no time to spare. The work is difficult, yet you choose it."

Gissin went on to speak about the future of Hillel's volunteers.

"Eventually, the young people that work for Hillel and take responsibility to lead, these are the people who make a difference. I'm full of admiration for the work you do. My only hopes is that next year this room will be too small," he said.

This year's room wasn't too small, but it was packed with young Jews. According to Zac Kaye, the executive director of Hillel, there are some 18,000 Jewish students on GTA campuses, and Hillel reaches more than 7,000 of them.

"We [stay connected] with actual e-mails, phone numbers and addresses," he said. "We are one of the most successful organizations in connecting with students."

Attracting so many people for an awards night didn't seem possible when Hillel first held the event 12 years ago, Kaye said.

"We started in a small room above a pub at the University of Toronto. We had to persuade students to come. Since then, we've grown into something special," he said.

Kaye also credited this growth to choice.

"Students don't have to get involved," he said. "There are so many other things they can do with their time, but they do tremendous things."

Some volunteer initiatives included CHANGE, a global awareness committee that's part of Hillel at U of T. The committee was run by Allie Caperfain, who received the University of Toronto campus award.

The cast of Hillel's student-run production of Anything Goes won the Outstanding Arts and Culture award, and Hayley Fisher was recognized for using a full-sized bathtub at York University to collect toiletry items for a shelter.

Fisher collected two bathtubs worth of toiletries and won the David Liss award for her efforts.

The final award was not given to a student. Instead, the Founding Friend of the Campus Award went to Mark Anshan, director of public affairs for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, for his work in the Jewish community.

Don't be a wimp; go for custody

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 26 years

Question. I am a single mother. My child is three and a half years of age. His father is not in his life and, of his own choosing, has not seen him or taken any interest in him for over a year and a half. Also, I receive no child support and don't want it. I just want to be able to travel with my son, but need the father's written permission or Foreign Affairs Canada says that I should get a Court order for full custody. Then, I can get a passport without his permission. Do I really need a full-blown custody trial just to travel with my son?

Answer: I would first request that dad consent to a Court order to give you sole custody, without any access. Also, ask for child support based on his annual income after he discloses what he earns. There is no reason why you should not seek it since you are entitled to custody (or at least primary residential care and control).Don't be a wimp. If dad says no or doesn't answer, then I would sue for sole custody in your local Ontario Court of Justice. If he fails to file an "answer" to the Court action, then you win almost automatically. After a prescribed time, I can "note him in default" — that entitles you to ask the Judge for a custody and support judgment at a Court hearing without his being further notified. The Judge only hears your evidence.

Sometimes there is no oral evidence in such cases. In a default hearing, the Judge will occasionally even allow all the evidence to be reviewed in writing. If dad does file an answer in which he claims for custody himself, joint custody, or access — or if he wishes to defend the child support claim — the matter could lead to a contested trial. However, in 90 per cent of these cases the matter is settled before a Judge well beforehand at a series of one to three consecutive mediation-type sessions (called a case conference, settlement conference and trial management conference). In these sessions, Judges work hard to convince parties to settle based on their experience.

In many cases like yours, primary caregivers obtain Court orders for the right to travel, child support and, at least, for primary care and control if not outright sole custody. If the fellow wants it he gets some form of access scheduled, or just left open. And trials are becoming increasingly rare.

N.B. shul sells its building

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — One era in Saint John, N.B., is ending, but the president of the city's lone synagogue is confident that a new one is just beginning.

Shaarei Zedek Synagogue has been sold, after serving the Saint John Jewish community for 88 years. Once a thriving centre of nearly 300 families and 1,400 Jewish people, the New Brunswick port city's shul now has 55 members – families or singles – 13 of whom live away. Another 13 are very elderly and mostly inactive.

"We have about 29 active family memberships, and of those, only 15 are really active," said president Norman Hamburg, adding that the costs of maintenance and upkeep of the large shul are becoming overwhelming for the congregation.

The building and its adjacent community centre, home of the venerable Saint John Historical Museum, had been for sale for the last five years and were finally sold to the city earlier this year.

Both will close at the end of November.

"It's going to be used as part of urban renewal," said Hamburg. "It will be disappointing to lose Shaarei Zedek, a building that can seat 550 people and is considered by many to be the most beautiful synagogue in the Atlantic region. But our members recognized the cost factors and, when we voted on the sale, only one of 30 attending said nay."

Shaarei Zedek, a Conservative, egalitarian congregation, began as an Orthodox shul in 1919 in a building that formerly housed a Christian church, built in 1865. It became Conservative in the 1950s and continues to hold Friday night and Saturday services, rarely missing a minyan.

Hamburg said the community plans to build another shul and community centre. "With a new, smaller, more efficient building, our costs would be cut considerably."

The museum, established in 1986, is still active, with thousands of visitors stopping in each year. Increased cruise ship traffic, and tourism generally, have meant strong visitation.

Much museum support comes from Saint Johners living far from their place of birth and growing-up years. It's administered by a board that's separate from the shul and has Jewish and non-Jewish members.

Hamburg said the community is looking about 15 years ahead as it plans a new shul and museum.

"We feel Saint John is in a boom period, with growth from the energy industry and a new medical school to be built here in the next two years. Both should attract new Jewish people. Any number of members joining the shul would be a huge boost for us."

Hamburg, a lifelong Saint John resident, said the money from the sale, plus funds held in investments, will support construction of a new building and museum.

He added, with a tinge of sadness in his voice, "Building new is the only option. If we don't have a home, we would really just fall apart [as a community]."

The sound of ceilings breaking

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I had the privilege of breaking yet another glass ceiling in Toronto this month. And I broke it together with a young bat mitzvah girl, so the symbolism was profound both for me and for her.

Here was a "veteran" of Toronto's patriarchal past standing on the bimah with this generation's newest Jewish adult female member, reading from a Torah scroll in a shul that has never had a woman read from the Torah before, and certainly has never had a woman rabbi leading the service.

This girl's family has a long and respected history with the shul. The shul is struggling to keep young people engaged, and is clothed in a "sort of Orthodox" nostalgia, although few of the members could be classified as truly Orthodox, either in practice or in theology. Yet the one tradition the shul clings to tenaciously is that women don't participate in any public leadership roles in the service.

Don't ask about the interesting negotiations that went on in order to "permit" this historic bat mitzvah to happen.

Suffice it to say, it happened, and things will never be the same.

Yes indeed, things will never be the same – because they shouldn't be. Judaism has survived and thrived because it has evolved (do we still sacrifice animals?) adapted (did Moses give a sermon in Yiddish?) and adopted (even haredim use cellphones, and those sects that disdain the Internet seem to have fantastic websites themselves.)

We are lucky to have young people committed enough, passionate enough and sensitive enough to care about preserving their roots while branching out into the new. We count on these young people to lead us into a renaissance of Jewish life that starts from the principle that nothing stands still.

As I said to you from the bimah, my young bat mitzvah friend, always keep in your heart the advice of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Israel: "The old shall become new, and the new shall become holy."

We build a new Judaism with not only reverence for the past, but true excitement for the changes that lie ahead.

If we are to survive not as a relic but as a living people, we will grow and we will change. That is inevitable. How we manage those changes so that we are not unrecognizable will be the deciding factor, not whether we change at all.

As the first bat mitzvah to read from the Torah at this shul, you stood on the bridge between the past and the future.

Actually, that's not true. In fact, you were the bridge.

Today's young girls don't have a lot of patience for a tenacious clinging to ideals that don't make sense anymore on a political, spiritual, legal or moral level. They look around them and see a whole world of opportunities that are modern and that fill them with self esteem. When they look to the Jewish establishment, and especially to their synagogue life, do they see the same?

I know one young girl who now sees herself as both "just" a bat mitzvah – "Of course I'll read from the Torah!" – and as a pioneer – "I will actually read from the Torah?"

Those few verses sung out loud – and proud – will reverberate for a long, long time, and in ways and places that we can't yet imagine.

Jewish Life

Worthy and unworthy aid

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Tragically, natural disasters are a relatively common occurrence. The scene is familiar – pictures of destruction and death, with pale-looking survivors searching eagerly for help. Calls go out for money to help rebuild lives and property.

The recent cyclone in Burma (Myanmar) has created a second tragedy that, from a moral point of view, surpasses the natural one. The refusal of the country's "leaders" to accept aid, thereby causing so much death and suffering, is one that taints the image of God in which man was created. A lesser-known display of moral bankruptcy is the fact that ample warning about the impending disaster was given and nothing was done to avert it.

This moral tragedy raises the question of whether one should provide aid to those whose wounds are self-inflicted. This issue has wide ranging implications and would include the appropriateness of giving a liver transplant to an alcoholic, cancer treatment to a smoker, medical treatment to a wounded (attempted) suicide bomber or financial help to a person who refuses to look for a job.

While each question has unique factors and must be judged individually, the question of helping those who appear unworthy of such help reveals much about a society. While some might recoil at even asking the question – after all, we must not stoop to the low level of others – others may wonder why we would consider helping those who don't want our help and may in fact want us dead. Both arguments have much logic – ethical dilemmas always contain many shades of grey.

It's crucial to note that the question only pertains to those who themselves are the cause of their own misfortune. We may not punish innocent victims because of their evil leaders. And while people often get the leaders they deserve (even in non-democratic regimes), this does not justify disregard for human suffering.

With rare exceptions, Jewish ethics demands that we help even those who are unworthy of help. We must separate the person from the deed. While one may argue that the recipient may deserve his self-inflicted wounds, and perhaps that is even true, the spectre of those who are able to help ignoring the pleas of the suffering takes an unacceptable moral toll on us.

When the need is great, one must offer help and ask questions later. Thus, one who claims to be hungry should be given food, despite our contrary suspicions, whereas one must investigate a person's claim of not having anything to wear.

Yet there are times when we must not bail a person out. The Talmud rules that if one sells himself into slavery, the community must pay to redeem him. However, should that person then sell himself into slavery again, the community must let him remain enslaved, even until he dies.

However, the crucial issue is not whether we should help the unworthy, but rather, given the limited resources that we have available, what is the best way to allocate them. This question is the crucial one facing the health care system in Canada, for example, and touches upon the core values of society.

Should factors such as age, family history, ability to pay, citizenship status, and the moral makeup of the person play a role in determining where scarce resources will be allocated? And if they should – which in some ways they must – to what extent? Surely one factor that must be considered is the effectiveness of the resources spent. Thus, it could very well be that aid to those who "refuse" it should not be given, not because they are unworthy recipients, but because such aid will yield much greater results elsewhere.

Birth of Israel on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"While the UN talked, the Jews were carving Palestine with a sword. In a whirlwind week, they seized Haifa, attacked Jaffa, won Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee and tried to cut the Arab supply road into Jerusalem. For the first time since the Romans levelled Jerusalem 1,800 years ago, a Jewish army ate Passover matzah and bitter herbs around campfires in the field. Said Jewish Agency Chairman David Ben-Gurion: 'We stand on the eve of the Jewish state… heartened by the victories of our army… We have just begun to buckle on the sword.'"

– Time magazine, May 3, 1948 [tinyurl.com/6ycggl]

This spring, we are being inundated with reports about Israel's first 60 years, its successes and its failures. But what those articles can't do is capture what it was to live through those early harrowing months both in Israel and around the world. To get a unique feel for those times, I've searched for original reports, photos, films and documents that were created back then and are now available online. In other words, a snapshot of what you might have been able to learn about the new State of Israel if you had an Internet connection back in 1948.

Just after the establishment of the state, Time decided to feature King Abdullah of Transjordan on its first cover story about the fighting. The article paints this picture. The Arab Legion "destroyed the Jewish settlement of Kfar Etzion and four others. In southern Palestine, Egyptian troops crossed the border into the sandy wastes of the Negeb [sic] Desert to seize Jewish settlements on the road to Gaza. In northern Palestine, where Haganah was trying to secure the Galilee region, Syrian and Lebanese detachments attacked Jewish settlements. Egyptian air force planes swooped over Tel Aviv in the first strafing and bombing raids of the war." [tinyurl.com/58grwg]

It wasn't until August that Time put an Israeli, Ben-Gurion, who was then prime minister, onto its cover. The tone of article was considerably different than that of the earlier one. "The new Israelis walked with a confident swagger along beach front at Tel Aviv. They talked confidently – indeed, stridently – of a state of 10 million, not necessarily confined to the present boundaries of Israel." The article also feels like a primer on the country when it tells readers about the revived language of Hebrew, once a "dead language, a language of scholarship and liturgy for centuries… not to be confused with Yiddish." [tinyurl.com/6ycggl]

Speaking of Hebrew, you can read the entire front page of the May 14 edition of Yediot Ahronot, the "newspaper of the Land of Israel." The headline reads, "The State of Israel will be established at 4 p.m." Other articles talk about how the Jewish forces have entered Jaffa and the last British soldier has exited the country. [tinyurl.com/6axggx]

Two days later, the Palestine Post proclaimed, "STATE OF ISRAEL IS BORN." You can look at a reproduction of the front page [tinyurl.com/3frsbk] as well as other highlights where you'll learn that Etzion settlers had been taken prisoners of war; Acre had been captured by Jewish forces; and "a big surprise of the local tennis season was the defeat of the veteran champion, Finklekraut, by Apel in the Palestine Tennis Championships." [tinyurl.com/4nlk8s]

The Post has also put together some image galleries of the era including photos of:

- Jewish forces moving on foot from Ramle to Lod in 1948;
- donkeys being mobilized for Jerusalem street cleaning to keep typhoid at bay during the gas shortage; and
- raising the flag in Umm Rashrash (now Eilat), marking the end of the war. [tinyurl.com/5sl62a]

For more, go to Google images [tinyurl.com/654b2k], CBC News [http://tinyurl.com/45gcw3] and to Israelimages. [israelimages.com] Once there, type the number 1948 into the search box. You'll find many classic shots such as the Irgun ship; the Altalena on fire near Tel Aviv; a woman on guard in Kibbutz Nirim; and the classic shot of Ben-Gurion declaring the establishment of the state.

This site offers and interesting bonus feature. If you see an image you like, you can attach a note and e-mail it as an electronic postcard.

Tribute to raise funds for Israeli ICU

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Center is honouring Dr. Bernard Goldman, a Toronto heart surgeon and Shirley Anne Haber, an activist, at its 2008 Tribute Dinner, to be held May 28 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The medical centre, located in Kfar Saba, about five kilometres from the Arab village of Kalkalia and 30 kilometres northeast of Tel Aviv, is the seventh largest general hospital in Israel. It's affiliated with the Sackler School of Medicine at Tel Aviv University.

Funds raised at the dinner will go to the centre's intensive care unit (ICU), which with its six beds, now admits and treats about 600 critically ill patients a year.

Prof. Brian Fredman, chair of the the Meir Medical Centre's department of anesthesiology, critical care and pain management, said from Israel that the hospital provides medical services to a population of 700,000.

"Due to improved medical capabilities, increase longevity and intifadah-related trauma, our current intensive care facility is unable to cope with the ever-increasing patient load. As a result, patients are often denied intensive care admission."

For some years, he said, the hospital has been making plans to relocate its ICU to a larger facility, and to that end, space was designated, architectural plans were drawn up, and a budget allocated.

"Accepting the fact that there are no public funds available for developing essential medical services, we are forced to seek help from friends who have both financial means and the wish to improve the plight of the simple citizens of the State of Israel," Fredman said.

Considering that the lack of adequate ICU facilities compromises the treatment that patients receive, he said, it was decided to begin the building process despite the hospital's inability to finish the project.

"As of now, the infrastructure is complete, but without additional funds, we are unable to continue," he said.

Goldman, who has operated, taught or lectured in a number of Israeli hospitals, said he visits the country often and knows virtually all its heart surgeons. "I am intrigued with the Meir Medical Centre, because it took in a huge influx of patients during the [2006] Lebanon war. The needs of the emergency department are unique. I am happy to stand for [this] hospital and recruit support."

Haber, who for seven years has devoted herself to countering anti-Israel bias in the media, said the hospital plays a crucial role in the life of Israel. "Located across from an Arab community and just north of Tel Aviv, it deals with Arabs and Israelis. I am totally inspired by the hospital, and the work it does."

Summer Fashion

BEAUTY SHOP

BY STACEY MICHAELS AND FRANCINE BIRKEN

Dedicated in memory of Carol Wise.

With summer just around the corner, it's time to give your face and body a healthy tan and protect them from the nightmare of a sunburn. Make sure to use a moisturizer with an SPF factor of 15 or higher.

When the warm weather hits, you may feel that a foundation is too heavy for your skin; so try using a tinted moisturizer and use a dab of concealer under the eye area. There is also nothing better than the appearance of a healthy glow, which you can achieve with a sweep of a bronzing powder.

For your daytime look, make sure to use lighter shades of shadow on your lids, and for evening, make sure to enhance them. Be sure to line your eyes with eyeliner and use waterproof mascara, as this is the best for the hot days ahead. Carry your lip-gloss and/or lipstick with you to keep your lips moist and fresh looking.

Rich, deep conditioners for your hair will help keep the frizz away and protect it from the sun.

Lastly, be sure and sprinkle your feet with foot powder before wearing your favourite sandals. This will not only help with sweat but it will reduce the chance of your developing blisters. Make sure to put on your hat and sunglasses and enjoy those beautiful summer days that lie just ahead.

HAIR: Maurice Fiorio tells us that for summer, edgy bobs, pixie crops and the fringe remain popular, still with lots of texture and movement. Fringes can be full or to the side. A crop is more masculine, but can be extremely sexy on the right woman. Still, stylists must be cautious with this style, as it doesn't suit all face shapes.

Waves, curls, braids, ponytails, updos, and backcombing are all in for the summer. Don't be afraid to accessorize these looks with a simple clip or thick hair band.

In terms of colour, we're still keeping it tone on tone to add depth to the hair. It must be very natural looking with soft, subtle highlights, avoiding bleached or artificial looks. Colours are going to be brighter and lighter, with focus on honey, auburns, caramels and soft blonde tones.

STACEY'S TIPS

SPA AND SKINCARE: Shed your winter blues and dead skin with new Alyria Resurfacing Body Care. With summer fast approaching and winter clothes vanishing from your wardrobe, so too should the layers of dead skin that have been hibernating during the cold winter days be eliminated. Resurfacing Body Care embodies what you should look for in a hydrating, exfoliating and softening body lotion. So throw away your exfoliating body products, abrasive scrubs and loofahs that scrape off dead cells! Instead, make room for new Alyria Resurfacing Body Care that takes care of both exfoliating and hydrating your skin in a safer and more soothing way. It gets rid of keratosis pilaris, known as chicken skin, smoothes away calluses on your feet, prevents ingrown hair and essentially hydrates your body all over. Make this all-in-one lotion your skincare staple throughout the year.

Moringa Bath and Body range

This season, the spotlight will shine its brightest on new NeoStrata Oil-Free Smoothing Lotions Level 3. While oil-free lotions have various attributes, exfoliation is generally not one of them. But new NeoStrata Oil-Free Smoothing Lotions and the daytime version with SPF 15 promote outstanding skincare benefits that will allow a healthy glow to shine through without the unattractive oily sheen.

Introducing dermaDNA by Dermaglow Cellular DNA Assessment Test and Treatment Line – the first and only product that measures existing cellular DNA damage in the skin due to UV exposure and is clinically proven to reverse and repair DNA skin damage and prematurely aging skin. Try it today!

By the time we reach 40, signs of aging – loss of firmness and noticeable wrinkles – are easily apparent. Lancôme Men introduces Rénergy 3D, which offers triple-action effectiveness so that the skin is instantly tightened and firmed and wrinkles are erased. The Lancôme Men range is also proud to announce the arrival of Energizer Total, a concentrate specifically developed for men's skin and designed to provide optimal exfoliation day after day, to boost cell metabolism and to give intense comfort. Also in the Lancôme Men range, don't miss Age Fight Anti-age Perfecting Fluid; Hydrix Gel Moisturizer and Balm Moisturizer, both with micro-nutrients; High Definition Shave Foam; Ultimate Cleansing Gel and Exfoliating Microdermabrasion.

Give your special lady the royal treatment with a gift that has stood the test of time from Yardley of London. An institute in luxury bath care, with products rich in English lavender, known for its calming, therapeutic properties, Yardley's array of creations from talc to foam baths, and moisturizers to soaps, are sure to let her be queen for the day, 365 days a year.

Beauty flash: curl up to gorgeous, luscious lashes with four essential grooming tools from Tweezerman – Classic Lash Curler, Supercurl Eyelash Curler, Corner Lash Curler and Folding Lashcomb.

Move over ladies. Men have become major players in the personal grooming arena. Now reliant on products that tweeze, trim and clip, an increasing number of men are maximizing their daily regimens to secure a winning appearance while using the legendary grooming brand Tweezerman Professional. Be sure to try HIS Deluxe Trimmer, HIS Facial Hair Scissors, HIS Moustache Scissors, HIS Deluxe Nail Clipper Set and HIS Deluxe Grooming Kit that brings four essentials into one sleek, convenient carrying case.

The Body Shop unveils the Moringa Bath and Body Range, a delicately fragranced set of six cleansing, exfoliating and moisturizing products that benefit from sensual, floral hints based on the flowers of the moringa tree, and a delectable assortment of moisturizing and protecting community trade ingredients. The products feature moringa seed oil, named "the miracle moisturizer" for its high level of protective oleic acid.

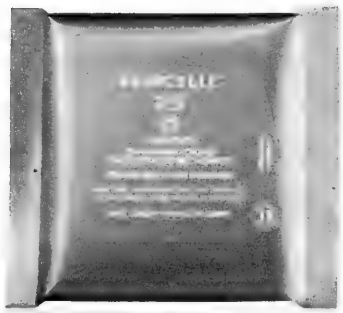
EYES: New for this summer, Cargo Cosmetics' new Melt-proof Make-up Collection is a limited edition kit of long-wearing makeup that doesn't melt, smudge or run. By the pool or at the beach, this makeup looks natural and stays put. The Melt-proof 3-in-1 Eye-Cheek-Lip Palette is a creamy palette of bronze and coral shades designed for eyes, lips and cheeks.

By popular demand, The Body Shop is launching a refreshing new Limited Edition Shimmer Cube palette in the latest seasonal shades. Each block of colour can be removed from the larger cube so that you can pop your favourite shade into your bag.

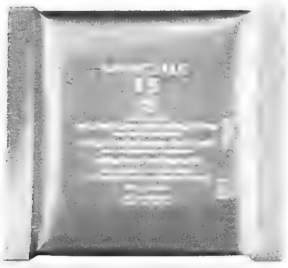
A genie in a bottle – get one wish – instant lashes. Caryl Baker introduces The Lash Extender, a unique professional formula especially for lashes. It will instantly and dramatically lengthen, add volume to and strengthen lashes.



Marcelle I-Bronze self-tanning cloths

LIPS: This June, brides will be able to kiss their grooms, sample their cake and keep their lip gloss on for six hours. Revlon is proud to introduce ColorStay Mineral Lipglaze, available in more than a dozen colours with an easy-to-apply applicator wand.

Add a touch of glamour with the new, limited edition Bronze Goddess Sheer Lip Tint SPF15 by Estée Lauder. This season there are the limited edition shades of Fuchsia and Bronze, and these creamy and emollient lip conditioning sticks create sheer colour, contain vitamins C and E and shea butter to nourish and moisturize.



Marcelle I-Bronze moisturizing cloths

FRAGRANCE: For the perfect summer fragrance, certain perfumes work better then others. Try to find the ones that are transparent citrus-based or flowery scents that are fresh. Are you looking for the ultimate expression of glamour, fashion, style and sensuality? Get ready for Kimora Lee Simmons' new fragrance, Baby Phat Fabulosity. It is a radiant, fruity, oriental scent that brings out the fabulous in all women.

Coty Beauty Inc. announces the launch of Céline Dion Sensational. The fragrance is a modern, luminous floral created by Maurice Roucel of Symrise. The packaging mimics the silver and white rays of spotlights criss-crossing the stage, announcing the arrival of something powerful, someone of great magnitude.

Take a little Missoni fashion wherever you go. Missoni introduces two new refillable purse sprays, perfectly sized to fit into the smallest of clutch bags. Whether it's for a weekend away or as an office essential, Missoni summer offerings combine elegance with ease.

The Aqua Lily Collection is the newest fragrance line from The Body Shop featuring five products that are ideal for layering and have a delicate, fresh, floral-based scent. So for a fragrance that is a harmonious symphony of fresh, floral notes with a soft, musky finish, turn to the irresistible Aqua Lily Collection this season.

Enjoy all these wonderful products and have a great summer.

Canadian receives IDF award for excellence

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Natasha Stern grew up in Toronto in the most ordinary way. Like many of her peers, she was educated in the Jewish school system and had plans to go on to post-secondary school in North America.

But after she took a year off between high school and university to live, learn and work in Israel nearly two years ago, Stern, 21, decided to make aliyah through Nefesh B'Nefesh.

Today, Stern is a corporal in the education corps of the Israel Defence Forces, and just last week, she was one of 120 IDF soldiers who were honoured at the annual Independence Day ceremony May 8 at Beit Hanassi by Israeli President Shimon Peres, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Defence Minister Ehud Barak and the chief of general staff, Gabi Ashkenazi.

Stern, a lone soldier who began her service about 14 months ago working with olim who enlist in the army, was presented with the Presidential Award of Excellence by Peres and Ashkenazi.

Although Stern said she is honoured to receive the award, which includes a $1,000 scholarship through the Soldiers Welfare Association, she didn't decide to join the army for the accolades.

"I believe that Jewish people should be living in the Jewish homeland. This is the Jewish homeland, and I think I should be living here," she said.

"[I was taught] that Israel is an important place – gotta give money, gotta go visit – but I just really believe that we have this state and everyone has to chip in. There is no reason that it should just be Israelis fighting because they were born here."

Although Stern's parents, Ellie and Arthur Stern, were initially reluctant to accept their first-born daughter's decision to move to Israel, they quickly understood how important it was to let her go.

"She was so sure about what she wanted to do, and it was the right thing to do, and it is a great thing to do. She had to follow her dreams," her mother said, adding that she is proud of her.

"The initial reaction, like anything, is the emotional one," her father added. "But… I realize that my daughter is someone who is very committed and she has always been that way… She had that attitude and nothing was going to get in her way. Like any parent, you have to do a paradigm shift and say it's in the best interest of the child. We had to step out of the way, no matter how difficult it was."

He said that when Stern went on the March of the Living four years ago, her Jewish identity was reinforced.

"Before she made the decision to make aliyah, she had years of concretizing who she is as a Jew. Now that she knows who she is as a Jew, what does she have to do? What role does she have to play for the Jewish people? What kind of difference can she make?" Arthur said.

Although there were many experiences in her life that led her to the ultimate decision to make aliyah, Natasha said that spending Yom Hazikaron in Israel during her gap year was what triggered her desire to move to Israel and serve in the army.

"Yom Hazikaron was the day where I saw so much mourning and I thought there was no way that these kids – and they are kids – died just so that we could do Birthright and do March of The Living. They died so that we could move here, make it better, improve and add and give, and keep [Israel] going," Natasha said.

"It is one of the most meaningful decisions I've ever made. It is sometimes the worst thing ever, but sometimes the best thing ever. It's really hard. It's not a joke. It's really hard for everyone in different ways."

Natasha said she is humbled to be one of 120 soldiers who were recognized for their contributions, but she doesn't want it to detract from the work that every other soldier is doing.

"Everyone works so hard in the army. I believe that a lot of people give everything they can."

Before getting the news that Natasha would be receiving the award, her parents had joined an adult group of the March of the Living who travelled abroad from April 28 to May 11.

When they applied to participate on the march, which starts in Poland and ends in Israel, they had no idea that they would be in Israel on the same day that their daughter would be publicly recognized as an outstanding soldier.

Natasha's 18-year-old sister, Alex, who is currently studying in Israel, was also there to witness the ceremony.

Another aspect of the event that can be chalked up to fate is that Natasha's grandmother and great-grandmother were liberated from Auschwitz-Birkenau on May 8 – the same day Natasha received her award.

"This is everything that a child of a survivor, that a survivor, dreams of. It was my mother's dream being realized. It just sent chills down my spine," Arthur said about watching his daughter shake hands with Peres.

"Next to childbirth – she's done good in a lot of dance recitals – but next to childbirth, this was right there."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

U.S., Israel want 'tangible action' on Iran nukes

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States and Israel agree on the need for "tangible action" to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's spokesperson said Friday, after a visit by U.S. President George W. Bush.

"We are on the same page. We both see the threat... And we both understand that tangible action is required to prevent the Iranians from moving forward on a nuclear weapon," Olmert spokesperson Mark Regev said.

Regev described diplomatic efforts so far to exert pressure on Iran as "positive," but added: "It is clearly not sufficient and it's clear that additional steps will have to be taken."

Asked about the option of using military force, Regev said: "Leaders of many countries have talked about many options being on the table and, of course, Israel agrees with that."

Senior officials in Jerusalem said last Thursday that Israel is fully satisfied with the results of Bush's visit, including policy on Iran's nuclear program.

"In talks with the president of the United States during his visit, it was made clear that Bush's statements on the subject of Iran's nuclear program are fully backed in practice," a senior official said.

The president's attitude on Iran was well-known in Israel, and the expectation had been that he would use forceful language against Tehran, both during talks with Israeli officials and in his address to the Knesset, not only on the nuclear question but on Iran's role in the region.

During meetings with Olmert and Defence Minister Ehud Barak, more data was presented to back the desire for a reassessment of an American intelligence report that concluded that Iran had halted its nuclear weapons program.

One Israeli source said that it is hoped that the new information would influence the administration's stance on Iran's nuclear program.

The source said that Olmert would discuss the subject during his visit to Washington in a week.

Bush ended his three-day visit to Israel on Friday and headed for Saudi Arabia.

The president and first lady Laura Bush flew out of Tel Aviv's Ben-Gurion Airport after a morning at Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem, where they viewed artifacts from the time of biblical writings and spoke with young Israelis about hopes for peace.

In his address to the Knesset last Thursday, Bush promised unflinching U.S. support. "Citizens of Israel, Masada shall never fall again, and America will always stand with you," he said.

Bush added that calls for negotiations with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad are akin to the efforts to appease Hitler before World War II.

The president opened his speech by saying in Hebrew: "Happy Independence Day." His address focused on the alliance between the United States and Israel.

"Israel's population may be just over seven million. But when you confront terror and evil, you are 307 million strong, because America stands with you," Bush said.

"You have raised a modern society in the Promised Land, a light unto the nations that preserves the legacy of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. And you have built a mighty democracy that will endure forever and can always count on America to stand at its side."

He noted that Israel's Declaration of Independence "was the redemption of an ancient promise given to Abraham, Moses and David – a homeland for the chosen people in Eretz Yisrael."

The president also presented his vision of Israel in the next 60 years. "Israel will be celebrating its 120th anniversary as one of the world's great democracies, a secure and flourishing homeland for the Jewish people."

His address was interrupted no less than 14 times by loud applause.

"America stands with you in breaking up terrorist networks and denying the extremists sanctuary. And America stands with you in firmly opposing Iran's nuclear weapons ambitions. Permitting the world's leading sponsor of terror to possess the world's deadliest weapon would be an unforgivable betrayal of future generations. For the sake of peace, the world must not allow Iran to have a nuclear weapon," the president said.

Bush accused Ahmadinejad of seeking to return the Middle East to the Middle Ages by calling for the destruction of Israel.

"Some seem to believe we should negotiate with terrorists and radicals, as if some ingenious argument will persuade them they have been wrong all along," he said. "We have heard this foolish delusion before. As Nazi tanks crossed into Poland in 1939, an American senator declared: 'Lord, if only I could have talked to Hitler, all of this might have been avoided.' We have an obligation to call this what it is – the false comfort of appeasement, which has been repeatedly discredited by history."

After the speech made by German Chancellor Angela Merkel to the Knesset in March, it was hard to expect a more pro-Zionist speech. But as a former Knesset speaker, MK Reuven Rivlin, put it, "I wish our leaders would make speeches like this." Rivlin described Bush as "manifesting the Zionist vision."

Contrary to the applause Bush received for his address, the speech by Olmert was less popular and stirred considerable controversy.

Olmert promised that when there is a peace agreement it "will be approved by a large majority in the Knesset and it will be supported by the vast majority of the Israeli public."

Two MKs from the National Union, Zvi Hendel and Uri Ariel, left the plenum in protest, complaining that the event was "used to promote a political agenda that is opposed by most of the Israeli public."

Hendel issued a statement calling on Olmert "to learn from the president of the United States what Zionism is."

Throughout exchanges among the rival Israeli politicians, Bush appeared to be enjoying himself.

Olmert diverged from his speech to say that "we will bring before the Knesset an agreement that is based on the vision of two states for two peoples. This agreement will be approved by a large majority in the Knesset and the entire nation."

On Iran, Olmert said that "the seriousness of the threat demands that no means be discounted." However, he made it clear that "a uniform international political and economic front against Iran is currently in place, and tougher and more effective sanctions are a necessary stage, even if it is not the final stage, on the right way to block the Iranian threat."

Bin Laden vows to 'fight' Israel for Palestinian land

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Al Qaeda will continue the fight against Israel and not give up an inch of Palestinian land, the terror group's leader, Osama bin Laden, said in an audio recording released last Friday.

"We will continue, God permitting, the fight against the Israelis and their allies… and will not give up a single inch of Palestine as long as there is one true Muslim on earth," the Saudi-born bin Laden said in the recording, posted on an Islamist website.

Bin Laden said Israel's anniversary celebrations were a reminder that the country did not exist 60 years ago and was established on land seized from Palestinians by force.

"This is evidence that Palestine is our land, and the Israelis are invaders and occupiers who should be fought," he said.

Bin Laden noted that decades of peace initiatives have failed to establish a Palestinian state and that the West has sided with Israel.

"The participation of western leaders with the Jews in this anniversary celebration confirms that the West backs this Jewish occupation of our land, and that they stand in the Israeli corner against us," he said. "They proved this in practice by sending their forces to southern Lebanon."

He also said western media has, over the years, painted Israelis as victims, and the Palestinians who were displaced from their land as terrorists.

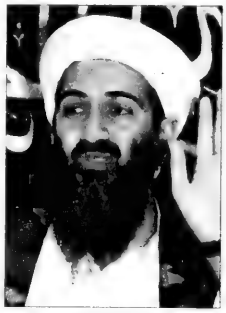
The authenticity of the recording could not immediately be verified, but the voice sounded like Bin Laden's.

Laura Mansfield, an analyst who monitors Islamist websites, said bin Laden appeared to be changing his emphasis.

"In his initial messages, bin Laden's focus was on the removal of U.S. forces from [Saudi Arabia], but in recent years, he has more closely wedded himself to the Palestinian issue."

The announcement appeared on various Islamist message boards on the Internet, with a banner announcing Israel's anniversary as the topic, according to Mansfield.

The speech is addressed to "western peoples" and titled "The Causes of Conflict on the 60th Anniversary of the State of Israeli Occupation," the SITE Institute monitoring group said.



Osama bin Laden
[File photo]

In a March 20 message, his second in 2008, bin Laden urged Muslims to keep up the struggle against U.S. forces in Iraq as a path to "liberating Palestine."

Al Qaeda has vowed attacks on Jews both inside and outside Israel, and it regularly expresses support for the Palestinians.

The group is widely blamed for a suicide attack on an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya and a simultaneous failed attempt to shoot down an Israeli charter jet near Mombasa airport in Kenya in 2002.

But despite calls by Al Qaeda supporters for the terror network to establish a presence in Palestinian areas, U.S. intelligence officials see no evidence it has done so. It's believed Al Qaeda faces competition for turf in the territories from the well-established Hamas.

In related news, Israeli military intelligence chief Amos Yadlin told Ha'aretz that in two years time, every community within 40 kilometres of Gaza, including "Ashdod, Kiryat Gat, even Be'er Sheva," could be vulnerable to rocket fire.

The May 14 attack on an Ashkelon shopping mall, which wounded about 90 people, made Yadlin's statement, offered before the attack, prophetic.

In discussing Israel's strategic situation vis-a-vis Iran, Hezbollah, Syria, the Palestinian Authority and Hamas, Yadlin said Hamas is trying to create deterrence against Israel similar to that of Hezbollah in Lebanon. Part of this effort involves broadening the range of its missile strikes in Israel.

Yadlin said Hamas already has significant capabilities. It has several dozen rockets capable of striking targets within a 20-kilometre radius, and it wants to extend that range.

"If this matter is not dealt with, Hamas will bring more cities within its range of fire," Yadlin said.

He noted that Hamas is preparing its defensive positions in case Israel invades Gaza. "Hamas' ground deployment is based on subterranean fortifications, explosive devices and snipers. Hamas has also set up a number of brigade-size units," Yadlin said.

Hamas nixes talks

Hamas turned down two offers of direct talks with Israel, JTA has learned. The offers were made during meetings last month between former U.S. president Jimmy Carter and leaders of the terror group, sources said. Hamas officials turned down both proposals, saying they preferred Egypt's mediation in the Gilad Schalit kidnapping and don't trust Israel on other issues because of what they termed past peace process failures.

Rockets hit synagogue

Three Qassam rockets were fired into Sderot from Gaza last Thursday evening, one of which struck the yard of a preschool adjacent to a shul, causing extensive damage to the building but no casualties. Several passersby were treated for shock. Earlier Thursday, three rockets slammed into the Sha'ar Hanegev regional council. No injuries or damage were reported. Defence Minister Ehud Barak warned against hasty military action against Gaza fighters, a day after a rocket fired from the Hamas-controlled territory hit a shopping mall in the coastal city of Ashkelon, wounding some 90 people. "After the events of yesterday, the blood boils and the gut wants to react," Barak said in Jerusalem. But he added: "It is more important to exercise judgment and to follow a policy of think first, act later."

Ban's language protested

Israel's mission to the United Nations is seeking clarifications after a communique from Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon's office made reference to the word nakba. The UN chief reportedly telephoned Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to express his solidarity with the Palestinians on the day they mark the nakba, the Arabic word meaning "catastrophe" that's used to refer to Israel's founding. Danny Carmon, Israel's deputy ambassador to the UN, told Israel Radio that the term "nakba is a tool of Arab propaganda used to undermine the legitimacy of the establishment of the State of Israel, and it must not be part of the lexicon of the UN."

Kadima discusses Olmert

Several Kadima MKs gathered last Friday to discuss the ongoing investigation against Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. It was the first meeting of its kind since the news first broke of the police probe of Olmert, but the participants said the meeting was merely a "theoretical discussion" and not an attempted putsch. No senior party members were present. No public figure from Kadima has publicly denounced Olmert since the latest investigation against him came to light. However, recent comments by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni about the importance of having "a moral spine and inner compass" were believed to be directed at Olmert.

Four London synagogues vandalized

JTA

LONDON — Four synagogues were vandalized in two London neighbourhoods last week.

Dozens of anti-Semitic and anti-Israel slogans were spray-painted last Wednesday night on shops, pavements and walls outside the synagogues.

Residents of the Stamford Hill and Clapton Common neighbourhoods were "shocked" Thursday to see some 40 slogans such as "Jihad to Israel" and "Jihad to Tel Aviv," according to media reports.

A spokesperson for the Community Security Trust, which provides for the safety of British Jewry, said the community already was on high alert after receiving threats from supporters of the Al Qaeda terrorist group.

Police said investigators were looking into footage from surveillance cameras and that forensic teams had recovered a canister of spray paint.

Australia to take Ahmadinejad to court

JTA

CANBERRA — Australia is preparing to take Iran's president to the International Court of Justice for "incitement to genocide" and Holocaust denial.

Kevin Rudd made a pre-election pledge in October that a Labor government would use the 1948 genocide convention to take legal action against Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for threatening to "wipe Israel off the map."

"The Iranian president's repeated extraordinary statements, which are anti-Semitic and expressing a determination to eliminate the modern state of Israel from the map, are appalling by any standards of current international relations," Rudd told Sky TV last week. "They are an incitement of international violence."

Also last week, The Australian newspaper quoted Attorney General Robert McClelland as saying: "The government considers the comments made by Iranian President Ahmadinejad, calling for the destruction of Israel and questioning the existence of the Holocaust, to be repugnant and offensive. The government is currently taking advice on this matter.

"The alternative to not using these international legal mechanisms is considering wholesale invasion of countries, which itself involves, obviously, expense but more relevantly, of course, the potential for significant loss of life," McClelland said.

Australia is the only country that appears to wish to pursue Ahmadinejad through the international court. According to legal experts, a successful conviction would be difficult to obtain.

Educator recalls Israel's birth pangs

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Sixty years ago, Arlazar Dormachovsky was roused from his sleep by bombs over his neighbourhood in Tel Aviv.

It was May 15; 1948, mere hours after Israel had declared itself a nation, and Egyptian planes were already doing all they could to make that proclamation null and void for the nascent nation of 600,000.

"The ceasefire was in 1949, but I don't think the War of Independence has ever ended," Arlazar Eliashiv said with a sigh.

The family changed its name to Eliashiv from Dormachovsky soon after independence was declared, abandoning a White Russian past for an Israeli future.

In an interview, Eliashiv, one of the Montreal community's best-known educators, recalled the birth pangs of the Jewish state with a combination of wistfulness, nostalgia and melancholy, a time when the jubilation that came with being born into the family of nations was forced to co-mingle with the horrendous human sacrifice that war inevitably wrought.

Even in his own neighbourhood and on streets nearby, people died during this period, although life carried on. In most ways, "it was a very happy society," he said, whatever privations and hostilities there might have been.

Eliashiv was born in 1933 in Tel Aviv, and was only 15 when the modern State of Israel began. His father, Zvi, and mother, Lea, had arrived in Palestine from what was then White Russia in the early 1920s and settled in Tel Aviv, where Zvi did labour work before securing a government job after independence. Eliashiv had a younger sister, Maya.

The family first lived in the southern area of the city, at the time just a large town, but later moved to an apartment further north.

Their address was 25 Ranak St., where they lived in a third-floor walkup with 1½ bathrooms that the Eliashivs shared with another family.

"For Shabbat, we used to buy a live fish that swam in the bathtub before we used it," Eliashiv recalled.

For him, the War of Independence began in earnest about six months before independence was declared, when the United Nations agreed to the partition of a Jewish state in Palestine. The whole country-to-be danced in the streets, even as furious Arab attacks against Jews began almost simultaneously all over the area, Eliashiv said.

Despite that reaction, it was pretty heady stuff, a dream to be fulfilled, this countdown to having your own country. Eliashiv's childhood lacked just about every luxury. At times, food and other items were rationed, but he had a strong family upbringing, and to keep up with what was happening, the family had "underground" radio broadcasting reports from the Haganah, the pre-state militia.

Eliashiv hated the British occupiers and "the way they treated us." He recalled a British soldier shrieking at him as he stood on his balcony during a curfew. Although only an adolescent and too young to fight, Eliashiv did his part to resist the British in the build-up to independence. When "illegals" made it to the ocean beaches of his city, for example, the Haganah asked residents to mingle with them right on the sand to confuse the occupiers. Sometimes, though, this backfired, with "legitimate" residents getting shipped off to Cyprus.

Teens like Eliashiv were put to work. Even before the 1947 partition vote, at age 13, he and his peers at public school had a form of "pre-army" training, a sort of "extended gym" that involved "running five or six kilometres at six o'clock in the morning."

Between the partition vote and the declaration of independence, Eliashiv said, there were curfews and blockades of ships. On more than one occasion, Jews were hung by the British.

When he was 14, Eliashiv and his schoolmates were approached by the Haganah and asked one-on-one if they could help.

They did, distributing Hachomah, an illegal daily bulletin, in storefronts. "There were always two of us, one slapping on the glue, the other slapping on the paper," he said. "We always worked in pairs and contributed in our own small way."

At that young age, with independence virtually imminent, he and his peers were also trained to use hand grenades and sten guns, a type of submachine guns.

Arlazar Eliashiv, then about 20 years old and a sergeant-major in the Israeli infantry.

"We used to compete over who could put it together fastest," he said, adding that parents did not really worry about their sons doing this type of training. "It was simply a part of life."

Then independence, and the war for a nation's survival was truly on. Six neighbours were killed in one Egyptian bombing run, and Eliashiv remembered 18 children who were killed during an outing.

"We watched the funeral during school time."

Families, including the Eliashivs, placed sandbag fortifications outside their homes in order to protect them from barrages of bombs.

Eliashiv said he would have liked to be more "part of the action," but he was too young, and like others his age, went to kibbutzim to help out while men of fighting age were absent.

"We stuck together," he said. "Life in the city continued. They didn't close schools or theatres or kindergartens. There were many, many sad events that happened, but morale was very strong."

The 1949 armistice brought an end to that war, but 60 years later, there is still no end to hostilities.

"You know," he said, "every anniversary is a happy occasion. You appreciate the great achievement of the in-gathering, the economy, all kinds of achievements. On the other hand, when you hear the number of soldiers that have died and what terrorists have done, it makes you sad."

Eliashiv, who is head of the Canadian Zionist Federation's Eastern region, also spent decades combating assimilation and teaching the modern Hebrew language and culture to generations of students at United Talmud Torahs and Herzliah High Schools. He also taught for many years at Concordia University, and was among the first to teach about the Holocaust in Montreal.

He was also largely responsible for the city's first participation in the March of the Living. His wife, Hanna, whom he met in Montreal, has for many years been a vice-principal of Judaic studies at Bialik High School. They have three children, Oz, Tamar, and Joey (Yoel), whose stage name is Joey Elias and who has become one of Canada's better-known stand-up comics.

Even though Eliashiv has lived in Canada for more than 40 years, his heart and sensibility remain very much "ba'aretz" (in the Land of Israel), especially when he recalls the eve of independence and the War of Independence, when the sense of kehilah and commonality of purpose was the strongest of all bonds.

"There was more idealism then," he said, despite the hardships.

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Toronto-born artist creates music 'out of love'

By RUTH MESTECHKIN
Special to The CJN

A few months ago, Brooklyn-based singer Chana Rothman played a show in Vermont. And it wasn't close to anything she had envisioned. It was a snowy day in a remote town, and the audience wasn't entranced by Rothman's melodies.

"These people were not my demographic," says Rothman. "And there was this one guy, he kept talking to his neighbours who were trying to listen."

But the 32-year-old musician wouldn't let the crowd's distractor win with his antics.

"This guy was literally sucking attention away from me. This is something I learned: if you give that person the attention they want, they'll be on your side," says Rothman.

Chana Rothman, who recently released her album called We Can Rise, doesn't shy away from experimenting with any and all musical styles.

She asked the man to help her out with a song, assigning him a solo role.

"He loved it," Rothman says, smiling and taking a sip from her cup of mint tea in the Toronto Annex's Grapefruit Moon restaurant. "And after the song was over, he turned back to his friends. But he signed the e-mail list."

The Toronto native says music has always been closely woven to her life. She grew up playing the flute, and then tried her luck at guitar when she was 16 at an international music camp. She wrote her first song, a "cheesy break-up song," about a year later. She later relocated to Colorado where she taught at a Hebrew school.

Four years later, in 2003, Rothman returned to Toronto, but she felt unfinished.

She journeyed south again, to Connecticut, and worked at a Jewish nature centre called Teva. That's when she started writing music that she said she finally understood the context for. Even though she's been recording since she was 20, her current album, We Can Rise, is what she considers her first. It came when she decided that her career was taking front seat. She also met Michael Dorf, a major organizer in the New York music scene.

"He said to me, 'You're really talented. Do you have enough stuff for an album?' And I was like, 'I have enough for 10 albums!'" recalls Rothman. "It felt really validating."

Rothman says since starting, she's grown more confident in her performances. She currently teaches at Jewish day schools in Brooklyn and Manhattan, and organizes song-leading, which brings the community together through music. With the tools she's grasped, Rothman's shows have netted a new edge.

"When you're with a bunch of 15-year-olds and they're not feeling your music, you have to do something different, because otherwise you've lost them. Most adult audiences are more polite, but you've still lost them," says Rothman, propping her knee up on the patio bench to rest her elbow.

"I've learned in the past few years to incorporate all the things that I've learned working with young people into my live performances, so I've become really interactive."

Her song-leading uses music as a tool to pass along values and construct community, something that she loves about Judaism.

"You see everywhere in the media that people are searching for meaning. This is such an individualistic society right now in North America, and we're being taught only to look after ourselves," she says. "To build community is not to force something on somebody else, but to give them a sense that they belong to something larger than themselves."

Rothman recognizes the plethora of possibilities that music comprises in its chords.

"I love when people write a song, put it to music, and it captures something inside of you that makes things true for you," she says. "I've always had an inner rhythm. I would always make up beats and hear things in the windshield wipers."

Even at Rothman's bat mitzvah, a cantor couldn't take all the credit: she led the whole service. For Rothman, singing is an avenue for tying communities together.

"I think music can be so many things, and it gives people an outlet they might not have, and it makes things feel safe or exciting," she says. "Imagine the world without music – it's crazy!"

Lately, Rothman's been experimenting with new styles: on her album, she integrates hip-hop and reggae, more than she had before. And her melodic fusion doesn't stop at genres. Rothman uses language too, blending Hebrew into her lyrics.

"Right now, this is where I'm at, and I get a lot of strength from it," she says. "Judaism was something that I loved, that I thought I could own."

She hopes that those listening to her music gain comfort, like the comfort she's gotten from songwriters who mean something real to her.

"I hope it gives people a stronger sense of pride in who they are," she says. "And I hope the messages that I'm saying are ones that work for people and make them feel heard, and make them feel like change can happen in the world."

Rothman is still seeded with doubts, and sometimes questions if she has the right to create music.

"But then you go and look at the crap that people put out there. And you're like, I better do this. Because if I don't, then someone else is going to," she says. "You're doing it out of love."

Rothman's already got her calendar marked up, too: she plans on recording another album, and has visions to collaborate and create cross-cultural programming events, and aid non-profit organizations with the revenues. This summer, she's trekking to Israel, touring and performing at Jewish summer camps. She also hopes young people will follow their passions, as best they possibly can.

"I hope that the choices I've made will give people the strength and comfort to be like, OK, I can do this. I'm sitting on the shoulders of other people who gave me strength, people like Ani DiFranco and Bob Marley. People who envisioned something that didn't exist and went and did it because they believed in it," she says. "I hope what I'm doing can be that for other people."

Chana Rothman's CDs are available at HMV, iTunes and Amazon, as well as Israel's bookstore & Judaica in Toronto.

Documentary focuses on a homeless teen in Jerusalem

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Early in Naf, there is a scene in which Naftali and his girlfriend are in a heated debate about whether he should be taking advantage of Christian missionaries, duping them into believing he believes in Jesus, so he can stay in their youth shelter.

To lie for the sake of personal safety – one of many dilemmas for a homeless teenager.

Directed by Moshe Alafi, and presented at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre as part of the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival, the documentary Naf: Street Kid follows 16-year-old Naftali Yawitz, who spent 2½ years living in the streets of Jerusalem. He left his haredi parents' home in England at 13.

The protagonist of the film is neither entirely bad nor entirely good. He is both a hero and a victim, with deep flaws. Indulging in petty crime, he steals money from cab drivers. He is a drug dealer who passes off baggies of oregano to unsuspecting buyers.

Yet there are some moments that show Naf's good character.

He refuses to sell drugs to a certain addict and spends a long time arguing with her about why he cannot conduct such business, for moral reasons, lest she risk overdose. He visits the Kotel to pray to "Aba" – the heavenly Father – for good fortune. He dons tfillin and tallit in a downtown square. How much of this is a show for the camera no one can be sure. But who of us should refuse a boy the opening to come home again, even if initially through superficial actions?

This street kid does not wholly live in a world of sex, drink, drugs and party-induced stupors, the film tells us. His ambition is to make life better for himself – to keep hope alive, however misguided the course.

He wants a career in rap music, and Naf negotiates with the Israel Defence Forces radio station to play his CD.

Moshe Alafi

As a representative of 350 homeless youths, Naf wants an acknowledgment from the Jerusalem City Council that street kids need more, and better quality, attention. Exasperated, he later resigns from his position, doing so by sending a handwritten letter of protest. The viewer learns that, for Naf, the sting of indifference is worse than life's pain .

"Naf has a goal. He fights for something. He doesn't accept his situation," said Alafi at the film's Q&A. "I'm not a social worker, but my duty as a filmmaker is to raise this problem up."

Naf has the strength to keep on fighting when many are indifferent to him. He is to face in court the middle-aged neighbour who sexually abused him, but the trial is postponed twice without prior notice. Enraged, Naf raises his voice to the prosecuting lawyer and is promptly escorted away by security, left to weep on a courthouse foyer bench.

Alafi's direction is discreet, without contrived closeups or hamhanded focus on the grittier aspects of homelessness. Pulling strings of empathy, however, is not the film's thrust.

Naf is injured in a street brawl, of which little is shown. No doubt the four-inch gash in Naf's skull is one of many bodily scars he has. It's through this that we meet Chana, a social worker who makes a complaint to the authorities on his behalf. It is through her the viewer learns that love is thicker than blood – for a homeless boy, she is all he has for family.

She is his protector after he is caught selling drugs. It is she, on camera, who quietly protests at the courthouse that a 16-year-old cannot be rehabilitated by throwing him in jail.

The film is not an investigation into the issue of the some 39,000 abused and neglected street kids in Israel. Though it is a documentary on street life, there are no interviews with government officials, social workers or many other street kids. Through Naf's story, Alafi conveys the message that without something to open our eyes to the higher possibilities of life, we might all be Nafs.

At the Q&A, Alafi told the audience that as of last Yom Kippur, Naf has returned to observant Judaism, works full time at a supermarket and is engaged to be married.

Jewish stars collaborate on Yehudah Gilden CD

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Anyone familiar with Orthodox Jewish music in Toronto knows the name and talent of pianist, composer, singer, teacher and arranger Yehudah Gilden.

Gilden has served as lead singer and keyboard player for the Nafsheinu Orchestra, led the Eitz Chaim Boys Choir and taught Jewish music to students at Associated Hebrew Schools. He has also performed at social events.

Several years ago, Gilden was stricken with Parkinson's disease, a degenerative disorder of the central nervous system that impairs motor skills and speech. Although he carried on for a few years, he soon could not sing, play an instrument, walk steadily or teach.

Friends and admirers of his work – including Dovid Kirzner, lead singer of the Nafsheinu Orchestra and part of the Dovid and Dovid group; internationally known singer and composer Abie Rotenberg; and Toronto chazzan and singer Shlomo Simcha – decided to produce a CD of Gilden's compositions.

The idea was both to publicize his work and to provide some financial assistance for Gilden and his family.

Toronto's Orthodox Jewish music community responded enthusiastically. Heshi Kuhnreich of Zemer Orchestra led a combined choir of singers from the Zemer and Nafsheinu orchestras; the Achdus Choir, composed partly of members of the now-disbanded Kol Chaverim choir; and the Eitz Chaim Boys Choir.

The organizers decided to approach Jewish music stars, to raise the impact of the CD and to show how far Gilden's influence has extended. Those who agreed to take part included Avraham Fried, Shloime Dachs, Baruch Levine, Yaakov Shwekey, Yossi Piamenta, the singing groups Lev Tahor and Shalsheles, and Yakov Young, a former Torontonian and a Gilden protege. They recorded their songs wherever they were, generally in New York or Toronto, and the music was mixed here. The arranger was Yisroel Lamm.

None of the performers was paid.

Rotenberg said that whenever it was possible and Gilden was up to it, the organizers brought him to the Toronto studio to add his unique touch to the recordings.

And unique is a word that can be applied to the CD Harei Yehudah. The production is professional and polished, providing a recording that is stirring, moving and a treat to the ears.

In the recording studio.

Yossi Piamenta and the Oziel Choir combine Middle Eastern, country and reggae styles in the Shabbat song Ma Yedidut, while Abie Rotenberg and Shlomo Simcha and the Achdus Choir give a moving R'tzey from Eichah (Lamentations). Shalsheles' three-part waltz for the well-known Eitz Chaim Hi, the prayer said while replacing the Torah in the Ark, and Yehi Shalom by Yaakov Shwekey, sung with violins and background vocals by the Achdus Choir, are lush and melodic.

The CD comes with a video featuring scenes from the recording sessions, an explanation of how the project came to be, interviews with the performers and production crews, Gilden and his wife, Tammy, and tributes from Gilden admirers.

Slightly embarrassed by all the praise (Rotenberg described Gilden as "gentle, kind, deeply religious – such a sweet person"), Gilden was especially struck by how everyone worked together so well.

"I got very emotional about the achdus [togetherness and unity] and camaraderie I saw during the production," he said.

Gilden said he misses teaching, adding that "the Associated kids, teachers and parents have been a great source of support."

When you are ill, he mused, "you need a reason to get up every day. Music is my raison d'être."

Although he is unable to perform, he wants to continue in the music world in whatever way he can.

He studied classic composition and music at the University of Kansas and at the Hart School of Music at the University of Connecticut.

"If anyone had told me that in 20 years, I would wind up so involved with electronics and stuff like that, I would have laughed."

In 1974, he decided to go to study in Israel for a year. He came back 11 years later, he said, an Orthodox Jew, with a wife and family.

When he began to compose specifically Jewish music, he found that "the words speak to me. Sometimes the melody comes first, but not usually. Sometimes in the middle of davening, a verse begs to be set to music."

The Gildens are dealing with their situation with a calm and all-consuming faith. How else could they both say that the song on the CD that means the most to them is Mah Oshiv, a psalm of David, that asks: "What can I give in return to HaShem/For all his kindness to me"?

Harei Yehudah can be ordered through several sources on the Internet or by writing to JF of Canada, 69 Charleswood Dr., Toronto, Ont., M3H 1X5.

JEWISH HIP HOP GROUP WILL KEEP HOLY BLOSSOM HOPPING

Holy Blossom Temple presents Six 13, a Jewish a cappella hip-hop group from Manhattan, as the last of its musical heritage series under the guidance of Cantor Benjamin Maissner.

The six-man vocal band delivers "an all-out Israeli evening" involving thumping "beatbox" arrangements, soulful harmonies and songs that range from hip-hop dance tracks to rock anthems; they sound like a full band using nothing but their voices.

Devised as a celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut and a tribute to Israel at 60, the concert also features the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir and Holy Blossom Temple Singers. Adults $25; youths $15 or $5 plus the donation of a non-perishable food item. May 25, 7 p.m. www.holyblossom.org

Am Yisrael Chai: Launched by Israeli businesswoman and philanthropist Galia Albin on the eve of Israel's 60th Independence Day on May 7, Live Hatikva is an initiative meant to educate Jews around the world about the words and history of the Israeli anthem. Hundreds of Jewish communities from Israel to Argentina, New York to the Netherlands, congregated simultaneously on that day to sing Hatikvah, thereby setting a Guinness world record for "most people singing an anthem simultaneously." Albin would like the initiative to become an annual feat.

"Hatikvah (The Hope) is the song of the Jewish people," she said. "It has been sung for many years, even prior to Israel's existence as a state, and is still heard in a multitude of forms and styles in Jewish communities all over the world." For more details, visit the website www.livehatikva.org.

Names in the News: Damages, a one-act play by Globe and Mail arts reporter Michael Posner, has been chosen for inclusion at the 2008 Toronto Fringe Festival. Featuring well-known actors Harvey Atkin and Howard Jerome, it will be directed by Kayla Gordon, executive director of the American Jewish Theatre and former artistic director of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre.

The play deals with two men, a rabbi and a haberdasher, both Holocaust survivors. Although they have been estranged for 30 years, one unexpectedly visits the other, seeking damages for wrongs committed against him.

Posner's nephew, Ari Posner, is writing some original music for the play – as he did for Jennifer Gould's Juno-winning children's CD, Music Soup. Damages will receive seven performances during the festival, which runs July 2 to 13.

Neil Sedaka to appear at Beth Tzedec

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

This Saturday evening at 10 o'clock, a crew of workers is set to descend upon the main sanctuary of Beth Tzedec Synagogue to transform it into a state-of-the-art concert hall for an appearance, on May 27, by one of the biggest musical stars – Neil Sedaka – to have ever performed in a Toronto synagogue.

Working through the night and probably much of Sunday, the crew will hang a curtain over the Holy Ark, build a huge vinyl stage that protrudes into the audience, erect several large scaffolding towers for professional lighting standards, and remove numerous pews from the extremities of the 2,000-seat sanctuary to improve the sightlines.

Sedaka, famous for such musical hits as Breaking Up Is Hard To Do, Calendar Girl and Laughter in the Rain, has agreed to the rare synagogue concert because of his personal relationship with Cantor Simon Spiro, a former pop-music performer from London, England, who worked with some of the biggest names in the music industry before arriving at Beth Tzedec two years ago.

"We're building a brand-new stage, and we're extending the stage with an apron that juts into the audience," Spiro said. "It's a way of bringing the artist right into the audience."

Spiro is singing a couple of numbers with Sedaka, who is bringing his own five-piece band and stage technicians for the rare gig. According to the mellow-voiced cantor, few synagogues anywhere would be able to meet the technical demands required to host the likes of a top-notch entertainer such as Sedaka, who does some 50 or 60 shows in major concert halls around the world each year – most recently in Australia and Manila. "It's a show that's never been put on in a synagogue before, a show that few synagogues could put on to this magnitude," he said.

Because a few wealthy friends of the congregation are sponsoring the concert, tickets begin at a reasonable $36 and go up by increments. The $250 VIP package includes a post-concert reception at which guests may be photographed with Sedaka, which is "something you don't normally get to do," Spiro said.

Sedaka is of Turkish-Jewish descent, and his name likely derives from the Hebrew word "tzedakah," meaning compassion or charity. The program will consist of many of his popular favourites and probably one or two Yiddish standards in recognition of his audience. The concert begins at 7:30 p.m. and the ticket hotline is 416-781-3514, ext. 218.

From Canadian civilian to Israeli army commando

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Aaron Cohen, a Canadian Jewish boy from Montreal, made aliyah in 1997 by way of Beverly Hills, Calif. He was not your garden variety immigrant. Obsessed by the exploits of the Israeli army, he joined one of its special forces, Sayeret Duvdevan, whose stock-in-trade is counter-terrorism. As a member of this elite squadron, Cohen, often masquerading as an Arab but once disguised as an American journalist, hunted down Palestinian terrorists in the West Bank. In general, his targets were planners and fundraisers rather than suicide bombers.

And herein lies a crackling tale of high adventure. In Brotherhood of Warriors (HarperCollins), Cohen and his co-author, Douglas Century, trace a young man's remarkable trajectory from Canadian civilian to Israeli commando. It is quite a performance.

Cohen, born in Montreal in 1976, was the scion of an old established Jewish family. When he was small, his parents separated, and he spent the next number of years bouncing between homes in Montreal and Miami. When his self-absorbed mother – a film and television writer and producer – married Abby Mann, the screenwriter who won the 1961 Academy Award for Judgment at Nuremberg, Cohen moved to Los Angeles.

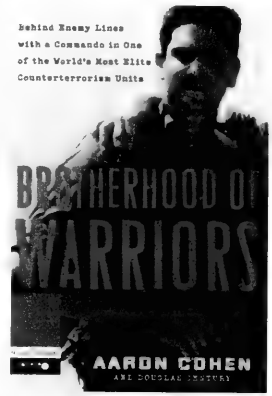
Mann was indifferent to Cohen, treating him "like a piece of furniture." The boy rebelled and had problems with authority. In the ninth grade, he was enrolled at a military academy in the Niagara Peninsula in Ontario. The school's headmaster, a Canadian army colonel who had been involved in Middle East peacekeeping in the 1970s, admired the Israelis. His admiration rubbed off on Cohen. As the young man studied Hebrew, he dreamed of settling in Israel, becoming a citizen and enlisting in an all-volunteer special forces squadron.

He arrived in the Promised Land with a duffel bag of clothes, a few Hebrew books and a cellphone, eager to fulfil his Zionist dream. He worked in a kibbutz fish pond until it was time to try out for the special forces. The gibushim, or tryouts, tested him to his physical and mental limits. He sprained an ankle, but persevered. "There was no way I was going to quit," he writes with typical bravado.

Cohen did not have the right stuff for Sayeret Matkal, the legendary special force he aspired to join, but was recruited by Sayeret Duvdevan, which was formed during the first Palestinian uprising.

He describes the training regimen as brutal. "In the United States and European democracies, our instructors' behaviour and institutional hazing would be considered sadistic, borderline criminal, an open invitation to class-action lawsuits." To survive, he adds, "we had to become emotionless, automatons, pure fighting machines."

Having survived the first phase, he was transferred to a top-secret Duvdevan base in the West Bank that resembled a Palestinian village. There he morphed into a commando. He learned how to use the short-barrelled M-16 gun and fire accurately from the window of a moving vehicle. He learned krav maga, a "full-contact fighting" martial art. He carried 70 pounds of gear on his back on difficult forced marches. He picked up the rudiments of conversational Arabic, how to look, talk and act like a Palestinian and how to disguise himself as one.



The gruelling training hardened Cohen, altering him forever. "It [hard-wired] a brand of aggression that [became] impossible to turn off," he writes. Yet he revelled in his new identity. "Clearly, I was getting something vital out of the Israeli army that I hadn't gotten from my dysfunctional show business family back in L.A. The bottom line for me was this: I'd never been happier. I had earned a place among the world's best fighters, and I had been granted tremendous responsibilities to do an important job. I loved being accepted into Duvdevan more than anything I could ever have imagined."

On his first mission as an undercover operative, his unit was dispatched to Ramallah to arrest a Hamas terrorist. Cohen's job, in a supporting role, was to secure the perimeter while an entry team flushed out the suspect from a house. To his credit, he admits that he was frightened, nervous and skittish. The operation unfolded perfectly, without a shot being fired.

Whenever possible, he says, violence was avoided: "Terrorist leaders and masterminds are no good to us as corpses. We want the information they can provide."

Yet fisticuffs occurred. Once, posing as a reporter, he "interviewed" a senior Hamas official at a cafe. As they talked, Cohen formed a "strong, genuine connection" with him. But when Cohen received a signal to incapacitate him, he reverted to form, jumping across the table and punching him in the face as hard as he could, with the result that Cohen needed 15 stitches to close his knuckle wound. On another occasion, Cohen was attacked with a knife by a middle-aged Palestinian woman. In self-defence, he struck her with his rifle butt, splitting open her chin.

In the only case of deadly force he mentions, Cohen opened fire on a Palestinian teenager, a Hamas courier, who had ambushed him. He hit him between the eyes, killing the Palestinian youth. Cohen was devastated: "I didn't sign up to kill kids."

He describes still more operations, including a complex one tasked with the mission of arresting a Hamas official who had organized a suicide bombing in Tel Aviv in 1996. On this operation, which went off without a hitch, Cohen posed as a sweet corn vendor as his companions stormed a wedding in progress.

At this point, he was burned out. "It takes a special type of personality – an intense level of commitment – to function long-term as a professional warrior," he says.

Having decided to quit after three years of service, Cohen booked a flight back to the United States in the summer of 2000. He does not really explain why he left Israel after resigning from the army. In Los Angeles, he was depressed, subject to radical mood swings. Having regained his bearings following a six-month stint as a drill instructor at his old military academy in Canada, he returned to Los Angeles and began working for a company specializing in "celebrity security."

For the next year and a half, he was in charge of a detail that protected actor Brad Pitt's mansion in Hollywood. Cohen is virtually mum about this chapter in his life, but it must have been incredibly boring.

In short order, he established his own company, IMS Security, staffed exclusively by ex-members of Israel's special forces. "Our reputation spread fast, and we started signing up several big-ticket accounts, doing celebrity protection for A-list stars such as Jackie Chan and Arnold Schwarzenegger."

IMS also guarded private Jewish schools in southern California. In the main, Cohen's focus was counter-terrorism: firearms training, SWAT-like takedowns and hostage crisis management.

Since the terrorist events of Sept. 11, 2001, Cohen's expertise has been in even higher demand. "I knew that the United States was far too vulnerable to Islamic terrorist attacks and I hoped I could do my part to sound the alarm," he observes.

By any yardstick, he has succeeded, both as a security consultant and in this engrossing book.

CJC applauds Kenney carrying 350 Indian immigrants was turned away from British Columbia. Other events to be memorialized include the Chinese head tax and the internment of Ukrainian Canadians during World War I.

"Our government believes history is important and we need to remember the good as well as the bad. There were moments in Canadian history we are not proud of, but that doesn't mean we can't learn from them," said Alykhan Velshi, Kenney's director of communications.

The Community Historical Recognition Program was first announced by Prime Minister Stephen Harper in June 2006.

"The program will fund community-based projects that will allow communities affected by Canadian wartime measures and immigration restrictions to have their experiences acknowledged in a way that is meaningful to them. Eligible projects could include monuments, commemorative plaques, educational material and exhibits," a government news release states.

Denying the St. Louis' passengers landing in Canada was "an unjust immigration restriction if ever there was one," Velshi said.

Farber said Congress pressed its case for a St. Louis memorial after the Conservatives took office. He applauded Kenney for his knowledge of the incident even before Congress made its case.

"He's an aficionado of history and was fully aware of the tragedy of the St. Louis," Farber said. "More important, he was aware of the importance to teach future generations about the dangers of a racist immigration policy."

Between 1933 and 1948, only 5,000 Jewish refugees were allowed into Canada. When the St. Louis sailed into Halifax harbour, director of immigration Frederick Charles Blair wrote to the prime minister, Mackenzie King, that the refugees were not qualified to enter Canada.

In None is Too Many, authors Irving Abella and Harold Troper document how Blair pursued a policy, approved by the prime minister, that restricted Jewish immigration. As a result, Canada had the worst record of any western country in admitting Jewish refugees fleeing the Nazis, Abella and Troper write.

Teenage Calgary ski jumper on national team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As sports go, it's one of the most spectacular.

Freed of earthly constraints, if only temporarily, ski jumpers soar with the eagles, traversing 100 to more than 200 metres through the air before touching down again.

It's a sport that's certainly not for the faint-hearted, yet Nata de Leeuw, though only 17, has been jumping for about six years, in the last couple of years almost exclusively on "normal" hills of 85 to 109 metres in length. Today she finds herself ranked 12th in the world – and that after a season she humbly described as "not that great."

Nata de Leeuw

Great season or not, she's the second-ranked Canadian female ski jumper according to the International Ski Federation (FIS) and a member of Canada's four-skier national team.

At her last international event, the World Junior Championships in Zakopane, Poland, she finished 12th, her top finish in the 2008 season. "I didn't do very well," she said on the phone from her home in Calgary. "I had an off day."

In 2007, an altogether better year for her, her best performance was second place at the Continental Cup in Lake Placid, N.Y. She also registered one third-place finish and three fourths that season.

In 2008, by contrast,17th place in the Continental Cup in Bairsbronn, Germany was her best finish beside the World Juniors.

De Leeuw's farthest jump is 115 metres and she shrugs off a query as to whether she gets nervous soaring through the air for such a distance.

She's used to it now, she replied. "You start off with small jumps, just a few metres and you extend it. Going to the bigger jumps was a little scary."

De Leeuw took up ski jumping about six years ago, but she's been on skis since about age two. For years, she was a downhill skier, but she always liked the small jumps she encountered.

One summer she enrolled in a multi-sport summer camp that included ski jumping. Summertime skiers usually jump on plastic surfaces that simulate snow.

"I thought it was a lot of fun, and you get to be in skis the year round," she said of ski jumping.

Around the time she began ski jumping, her little brother, Yukon, 15 now, also took up the sport. Like big sis, Yukon excels as a ski jumper. He's a member of the Alberta provincial team and his longest jump, again like big sis, is around 115 metres. This past winter, Yukon travelled abroad for international competitions and was the youngest skier participating, Nata (short for Natalie) recounted.

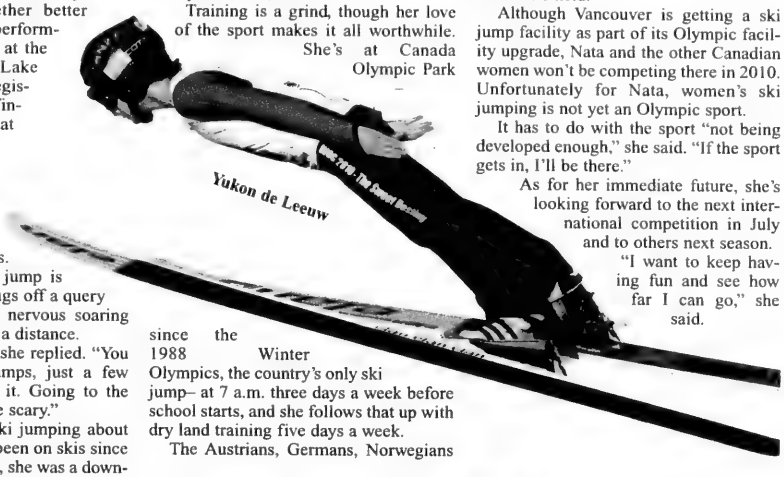
Top jumpers share some characteristics, Nata said. "You need a lot of quick, twitch muscles, strong leg muscles. You need to be quick and fearless."

Everyone falls now and then, she continued.

Her worst accident? "A bad one last winter [2007]" in which she broke her nose.

A grade 11 student at the National Sport School, Nata, like others in the program, is given the opportunity to miss class to attend competitions. It sounds like fun, but it's not a particularly glamorous life on the road – just the four national skiers and their coach, tooling around Europe in a van, she said.

Training is a grind, though her love of the sport makes it all worthwhile. She's at Canada Olympic Park since the 1988 Winter Olympics, the country's only ski jump– at 7 a.m. three days a week before school starts, and she follows that up with dry land training five days a week.



Yukon de Leeuw

The Austrians, Germans, Norwegians and other Europeans dominate the sport, and Europe is where all the major competitions are held.

Although Vancouver is getting a ski jump facility as part of its Olympic facility upgrade, Nata and the other Canadian women won't be competing there in 2010. Unfortunately for Nata, women's ski jumping is not yet an Olympic sport.

It has to do with the sport "not being developed enough," she said. "If the sport gets in, I'll be there."

As for her immediate future, she's looking forward to the next international competition in July and to others next season.

"I want to keep having fun and see how far I can go," she said.

Memories of Passover

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

Passover, like many of the Jewish or other religions' holidays, flourishes as a combination of family reunification, religious rituals and the sharing of food, a key component of most religious festivals.

People often have associations about Passover because it is almost universally celebrated in one way or another and most Jews have long-standing vivid recollections of Passovers past.

At one recent seder, the memories of previous experiences were recalled by family and friends seated around the table. The focus of recollections ranged from the effects of wine on the young and the dishes served to how one recipe was different from another and how our forebears conducted their seders compared to how we do it now.

A Passover phenomenon that I observed this year at a seder was the introduction of new versions of the Haggadah, which were used alongside older standard versions, as well as a revered grandparent's old Haggadah. In terms of the conduct and flow of the seder, it was at times a humorous challenge as each person's reference point was periodically different from the one being read from and the flow of the narrative was at times interrupted. This could be interpreted as a positive expansion of the Passover story experience or an impediment to completing the chronicle and getting to the meal while the readers were still conscious enough to enjoy it.

The experience reminded me of a previous experience from which all of us can learn, and which I understand as a geriatrician, but which is sometimes perceived with some expression of amazement – that is, having an elder in the family, especially one who is experiencing cognitive impairment, being able to effectively conduct the seder from an original Haggadah, with the appropriate rhythm and tones that he had used throughout his years of leading seders. This might be the same person who cannot remember the details of a conversation that occurred 10 minutes before.

The importance of this observation is that those of us who deal with aging parents and relatives have to understand that so-called "memory loss" as the hallmark of dementia is somewhat of a misnomer. It is not remote memory per se that is lost – in fact, distant memories are often vividly retrievable. It is the immediate recall and retention component of memory that is the main attribute of the memory impairment we see in dementia.

This phenomenon, for the lay person, often seems counter-intuitive. I have heard family members say and I once had a medical legal case that reflected this: "I can't believe my father does not remember what he had for breakfast a half hour ago, but can tell me the whole menu of the first Passover he had when he arrived in Canada from Poland in 1938."

In the legal case, a lawyer who was asked to assist in a will change erroneously believed that because he could reminisce with the patient about his knowledge of the lawyers' father from 40 years previously, he should be able to change his will, about which he could remember nothing 15 minutes after the substantial and materially important changes were made.

The message to loving family members is: let your aging and cognitively impaired parents use their past memories to advantage and as creatively and socially meaningfully as possible. If you are going to introduce changes to ingrained patterns of participation, be prepared for some chaos during the transitional stage, an occurrence that may be worthwhile, depending on what in the end you wish to achieve. And most importantly, get as much joy out of holidays with family and friends – a key to our Jewish traditions.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

CHOPPED VEGGIE SALAD W/ WATERMELON & FETA CHEESE

- 1 lb. plum tomatoes, diced, drained
- 1 1/2 c diced seeded watermelon
- 1 lg green pepper, seeded, cut into cubes
- 1/2 large English cucumber, seeded, cut into cubes
- 1/2 c thinly sliced radishes

DRESSING:

- 10 oz. feta cheese, broken into small cubes
- 3 tblsp olive oil, divided
- 2 green onions, chopped
- 1/4 c sliced fresh mint leaves
- 1/2 c plain thick yogurt
- 1 tsp oregano

Toss salad ingredients with 2 tblsp oil in large bowl. Add 1/2 each of cheese, green onions, and mint. In processor, add remaining cheese, green onions, mint, oil, yogurt and oregano. Process just to blend (do not overmix or dressing will get thin). Season with salt and pepper; mix into salad.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Having just spent a Shabbat in Lublin with the hundreds of Canadian students on the March of the Living, I have much to tell, but too much for one tiny column. My last piece dealt with human responsibility as one of the messages of Pesach, and I spoke to the young people in Poland about responsibility.

They needed to know why the Jewish community was investing time, money and energy in having them commemorate Yom Hashoah in Auschwitz and celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut in Jerusalem.

As our survivors age and leave us, we need to nurture witnesses who can act as the memory trust of the Jewish people.

I asked the young people to imagine how distant their grandchildren will feel from the events of 1939 to 1945 and 1948. After an experience as moving as the March of the Living, these young people must act on the responsibility to be witnesses – to both the unimaginable horrors of the death camps and to the realization of a 2,000-year-old dream that was the establishment of the State of Israel.

It's already the case that young Jews can't fathom the loss that was the Shoah, nor the level of depravity that produced it. And there is the constant danger that those born into Israeli statehood will take the dream and hope for granted.

But it's not enough to be merely a source of memory. Testifying to the truth is insufficient. These young people must act on their moral conscience and begin to fashion Jewish life in a creative mode.

The specific lesson learned in Lublin was that of Rabbi Meir Shapira, the founder of Yeshivat Chachmei Lublin, in whose restored building we prayed and studied over Shabbat. Here was a proud and courageous Jew who had a vision that was based on the past but creative in its surpassing the past – a modern, purpose-built yeshiva with ample room, electricity, and running water, and a kitchen that spared the students from essen taig (eating in different homes daily on charity).

Sadly, the yeshiva ended up in Nazi hands, but the lesson of pride and courage is not lost on us. Continuity is not enough. Creativity is what revives us constantly as a people.

How great are we?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

We Canadians are not entirely honest with ourselves. We see ourselves as the world's peacekeepers, but we have not, as of yet, looked deeply at the horrifying way that we conquered, murdered and tore to pieces the societal fabric of our native peoples. We shelter ourselves from the pain of our past and, therefore, head into the future not knowing our true selves, misleading our progeny and wondering why our aboriginal people are so angry with the Canadian white man.

This same criticism about a lack of deep introspection can be applied to our Jewish community. We think of ourselves as one of the finest Jewish communities in the world, forever growing and with something for everyone. But we fail to really listen to the many community members who tell a story of their intense loneliness and inability to grow creatively as a Jew in Toronto. These stories are common.

I received the following letter from an observant Jewish woman who moved to Toronto in order to find a vibrant community, but eventually gave up and moved back home.

"Dear Avrum:

"I am not the most outgoing person and also for me to make a change and move to Toronto was a huge deal… When I went to many of the shuls, some people would say 'Good Shabbos' and move on or not say anything at all… People have no idea if you have lived in Toronto for years or if you're new. There are so many Jewish people in Toronto that I was just another person walking around. I did not find people to be all that friendly. I found people were always looking at me, wondering who I was and trying to figure me out.

"Toronto is so large and there is so much going on, and it's confusing and overwhelming. I felt like a small little ant coming in and out of the cracks in the sidewalk. My parents lived in Toronto in the 1970s and they said it was the same way then. Eventually, after a long time, they found people like themselves who were not from Toronto and in the same 'boat.'

"If it were not for my two friends I have known since high school, I would have gone crazy. One of them has lived in Toronto her whole life and finds it hard as well. I hope I was able to explain my experience in a clear way. Thanks so much. All the best. M."

How great is the Toronto Jewish community? Philanthropically, we are trendsetters, the "Go" square on the Monopoly board of the Jewish world. Outsiders visit our town regularly to collect funds for their respective charities, as the word out there is that money flows in our streets. We're good.

New shuls seem to open up every week, and you could visit a different kosher restaurant each week for a year and still face an unfinished culinary journey.

But in terms of our warmth, creative spirituality, acceptance and soul, I'm afraid we mirror our host country and are not exactly how we see ourselves.

Lorne Opler, a Torontonian who just returned to our community after many years of "estranging himself from it" and his faith, once wrote in the Austin Chronicle that his Jewish upbringing here was "insular" and made him unhappy and "frustrated by the lack of creativity and diversity." I will write more about Lorne's experience next week, as well as about others who have expressed to me their inability and unwillingness to live the lifestyle that's expected in our community, where a lawyer can be king, but a poet is silly.

I am a great supporter of our community and, therefore, think it's healthy to genuinely delve into our character, sometimes through the eyes of the disenchanted and those who feel like Lilliputians in an often overwhelming Jewish environment. Write me your thoughts.

Thousands walk for Israel

More than 15,000 people turned out for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual Walk With Israel event last Sunday. The walk raised more than $500,000 for various charities and causes in Israel, with a focus on relief programs in Sderot and the western Negev. According to federation, this year's walk set a "recent record" for participation. Please see related story on page 19. [Dave Gordon photo]

Media critic wins al-Dura case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Philippe Karsenty, the head of a French media watchdog group, is claiming victory in his long-running battle with France's main television news network over his claim that the purported death of Palestinian youth Mohammad al-Dura was faked.

A French appeals court ruled last week he did not libel television reporter Charles Enderlin and France 2 when he claimed its report on al-Dura's death was a hoax.

Karsenty has maintained that France 2 falsely claimed al-Dura, 12, was killed by Israeli soldiers in September 2000, early in the al-Aqsa (second) intifadah. The sight of al-Dura and his father huddled behind a concrete pipe at a crossroads in Gaza became an iconic symbol of the intifidah and was used to vilify Israel on an international scale. However, Karsenty believes the incident was staged, that al-Dura was never shot and that France 2 lied about the entire incident.

Philippe Karsenty

The Paris Court of Appeal vindicated that perspective, he asserted last week.

The language employed by the judge in supporting my position "was beyond any expectation," he said in a telephone interview from Paris. "The judge understood that the news report was truly 100 per cent fake. Every line of the verdict supports my assumption.

"The court said I have the right to [make] my statement – that the report was faked, that we've been duped by them."

Enderlin rejects that analysis. He said the court did not support Karsenty's claim the event was staged,

Parts Contract Signed

MONTREAL — Quebec-based aerospace and industrial products manufacturer Héroux-Devtek Inc. has signed a 10-year contract with Israel Aerospace Industries' LAHAV division to make parts for F-15 and F-16 fighter jets. They will be made at Progressive Inc., Héroux-Devtek's subsidiary in Arlington, Tex. The deal, which runs through 2018, is worth $10 to $12 million. Héroux-Devtek has its head office in Longueuil, Que.

Release Baha'is: CJC

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is calling for the immediate release of six unofficial leaders of the Baha'i faith in Iran who were arrested this month in surprise raids, along with another Baha'i arrested earlier. "There have been no charges laid to date in these cases, merely baseless inferences that those arrested were acting 'against the national interest' as 'agents of a foreign country,'" CJC said. Iran has previously accused Baha'is of spying for Israel.

WORLD

Workers Claim Abuse

DES MOINES — Former workers at the nation's largest kosher slaughterhouse allege they were sexually abused. The claims came a week after U.S. agents arrested 389 illegal workers at Agriprocessors in what was described as the largest raid of its kind in U.S. history. Meanwhile, the Conservative movement rejected a proposal to boycott the plant, which makes Aaron's and Rubashkin's products, out of concern a boycott might discourage Jews from keeping kosher, but its leaders say consumers should consider not buying its products for now.

Demjanjuk Denied

CLEVELAND — The U.S. Supreme Court has refused to hear an appeal by convicted Nazi camp guard John Demjanjuk to overturn his deportation order. Demjanjuk, 88, had argued that an immigration judge didn't have the authority to order his deportation. Demjanjuk was stripped of his citizenship in 1981 and extradited to Israel, where in 1993 he was acquitted by its Supreme Court of being the Treblinka death camp guard "Ivan the Terrible." He was stripped of his citizenship again in 2002 after new evidence showed he was a guard at another camp. In 2006, a judge dismissed his appeal to overturn a deportation order. The Cleveland-area resident denies helping the Nazis, claiming he was drafted into the Soviet army and captured by the Germans. Though the Ukrainian-born Demjanjuk's legal fight is over, he's unlikely to be deported, since neither Ukraine nor Germany will take him.

More Jews In U.K.?

LONDON — Britain's Jewish population grew for the first time since World War II, University of Manchester researchers said. The researchers say the number of British Jews increased in 2008 to 280,000 from 275,000 in 2005. They cited very high birth rates in haredi families. The number of British Jews peaked at 450,000 in 1950. But a researcher for the main umbrella body of British Jewry said reports of growth are premature.

Israeli Family Leaves Nfld. Church

ST. JOHN'S — An Israeli woman and her five children who had been living in sanctuary in a Catholic church in Marystown, Nfld., returned to Israel last week.

The family, who came to Canada illegally from Israel in 1996, had been living in the church's basement since the fall of 2005 after their application to stay in Canada on humanitarian grounds was rejected.

Angela Portnoy's husband, Alexi, was deported to Israel in 2006 after leaving the church to run an errand and was stopped by police for a traffic violation. The family's lawyer, Lee Cohen of Halifax, told the St. John's Telegram that the separation was becoming too much to bear, and that they hope to apply to return to Canada.

The Portnoys, two of whose children were born in Canada, were deported in 2000. They returned to Canada in 2001, but were ordered deported again in 2004. The couple say they don't want to live in Israel because they don't want their children to face army service and they fear mistreatment due to their Russian heritage.

Israel's envoy looks back at year with satisfaction

'The Canada-Israel relationship is improving every week'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada, is looking at his last few months in Ottawa with satisfaction tinged with some regret.

Satisfaction that the relationship between the two countries is as good as it's been in quite some time; regret that 10 years after Israel and Canada inked a free trade agreement, two-way trade remains stuck at the $1-billion mark.

Nevertheless, for Baker, the glass is a lot more than half full. "The Canada-Israel relationship is improving every week," he said in a telephone interview from Ottawa.

At the ministerial level, Canadian and Israeli lawmakers have good personal and working relationships. The countries' prime ministers, Stephen Harper and Ehud Olmert, "speak regularly on the phone," while their foreign ministers, Maxime Bernier and Tzipi Livni, are also in frequent contact. John Baird, Canada's environment minister, is slated to travel to Israel where he will meet his counterpart at an environmental conference, while Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of public safety, recently attended a conference in Israel and met with Avi Dichter, his Israeli counterpart.

Throw in the bilateral agreements between the two countries' police forces in the areas of drug smuggling and anti-terrorism, and for Baker, all in all, it's been a pretty good year.

"I like to think it's because of the ambassador, but realistically, it's a mixture of everything," he said. "The present Canadian government is very supportive of Israel… There are ongoing bilateral developments and they are much better than it has been in years. Harper is a leading influence in his attitude to Israel, but it's also due to a commonality and mutuality of interests."

Alan Baker

Canada's potential assistance in peace talks is valued, Baker said, given its reputation in the international community, as is its assistance to the Palestinian Authority in training police.

Canada's experience in making multiculturalism work can also serve as a model in the region. "Canada can help bring the Palestinians from a psyche of terror to one of living together," Baker added.

At the United Nations and its Human Rights Council (UNHRC), Canada has built upon a speech given by former UN ambassador Alan Rock in which he criticized divisive resolutions that did not advance peace.

At the UNHRC, "Canada has opposed one-sided resolutions" and the attempt by "Muslim states to hijack the agenda," Baker said.

He applauded Canada for withdrawing from Durban II, the follow-up to the notorious UN World Conference Against Racism in 2001 that critics said turned into an anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist event.

Despite those positive developments, Baker said, work remains to be done. "The bilateral commercial relationship is still disappointing to me."

Ten years ago, the two countries signed a free trade agreement, but he believes that it's been underutilized.

Concerns over security may have been a factor in limiting Canadian interest seven or eight years ago, but that shouldn't be a factor now, Baker said.

Israel is a "superpower" in high tech, with leading developments in the medical, agricultural and computer fields, and the chip inside the Blackberry was developed in Israel, he added.

Think of Jerusalem

In the ongoing celebrations for Israel's 60th anniversary, we must not lose sight of the 41st anniversary next week on the 28th day of Iyar, (June 2) of the reunification of Jerusalem.

Yom Yerushalayim is also a happy, grateful day of the heart.

My colleague, Sheldon Kirshner, writes in his column this week about Jerusalem, which he accurately describes as "a world unto itself."

It is difficult to imagine too many other cities on earth that, like Jerusalem, is the veritable tip of so many diverse, competing, compelling, comforting and distressing icebergs.

Countless roads converge in Jerusalem. The ones we see are only a handful of the roads we have actually travelled.

No matter where we are today on earth, to borrow and paraphrase from Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav, we have all travelled at some point through Jerusalem.

From the editor's desk

For anyone wishing to go there – again – there are no shortages of tour-guide books to Jerusalem. But two books that recently came across my desk appear particularly interesting, informative and helpful.

* * *

Jerusalem Step by Step, by Dr. Batya and Avigdor Kornboim (The WizeGuide, Haifa), is a uniquely imaginative guide and aid for anyone, tourist or Jerusalemite, walking in the city.

In fact, the book is not a book. It is a handy, convenient, sturdy binder of 12 small booklets. Each booklet is a chapter in the overall 12-chapter work.

Each booklet, apart from the first, the introduction, is a self-contained instructional guide to a specific neighbourhood walk in the city.

The 11 dedicated neighbourhood walks are: The Jewish Quarter; Mount Zion; Mea Shearim; Nahlaot; Yemin Moshe; Rehavia and Talbiya; Via Dolorosa, The Mount of Olives; Ein Kerem; The Israel Museum; and Wall-to-Wall Paintings (following the murals trail).

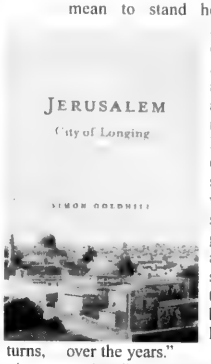
There is a great deal of material, cleverly, pragmatically and colourfully compiled in each of the booklets.

Maximum utility and high esthetics, it seems, were the two guiding production values of the booklets. Each of the booklets is removable from the binder, meant to be carried by the individual during his or her walk. The paper used is finished in high gloss, which enhances the bright colours of the scenes depicted. The language is, by turns, humorous and serious but always instructive. The street maps are clear and uncomplicated.

The information is eye-opening for the inquisitive tourist seeking further historical, religious, cultural, architectural, sociological, ethnic or other insight into the places, institutions and people he or she may meet along the way. It is also eye-opening for the hungry tourist seeking merely culinary insights to satisfy the growling stomach.

Jerusalem Step by Step should be available at the local bookstores. If it is not, the authors may be reached at wizeguide@gmail.com.

Jerusalem: City of Longing, by Simon Goodhill (Harvard University Press), is also an aid to the explorer of that golden city. But in a different way.



The author, a professor of Greek at the University of Cambridge, has written a work that explains the many-layered aspects of the city's history.

"This book is meant for the intelligent reader," Goodhill writes, "who wants to understand what it might mean to stand here or there in Jerusalem – to experience Jerusalem not just as a tourist site or as a day-to-day, mundane urban landscape but as a city where every space is layered with historical significance, religious intensity and extraordinary stories about the the people who have visited and lived in this city over the years."

Goodhill is a scholar who has written, in his words, "a tour guide for the thinking visitor."

In truth, all visits to Jerusalem lead the visitor to think, reflect, marvel and sigh at what the place is, what it was, and what we hope it may yet become.

Books that enhance an already tingling Jerusalem experience, such as these two, are to be coveted.

* * *

The caption in the photo that accompanied the Perspectives essay, Telling the stories of Canadian Jewry, last week contained incorrect information. H.M. Caiserman was the Secretary-General of CJC, not of the Congress of Social Sciences and Humanities. He was being greeted by David Rome after his fact-finding trip to Poland in January 1947. In fact, Caiserman was accompanied to Poland by Sam Lipschitz, former editor of The CJN's Yiddish Corner.

See]N Celebrating 60 Years of Israel

THE FIRST PRIME MINISTER

David Ben-Gurion (1886-1973) was one of the founding fathers of Israel and the country's first prime minister. After leaving public life, he retired to Kibbutz Sdeh Boker in the Negev. Affectionately known as "haZaken" (the Old Man), in later years he devoted himself to writing in his book-lined study. Israel faces leadership crisis: Birthright co-founder

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Israel needs better leadership, the co-founder of Birthright Israel told a group of Jewish businesspeople in Toronto last week.

"Israel is not what it used to be. The government in Israel is about as poor as any [government] in the West. We need to have role models. Something has to change. If it doesn't come from them, it must come from us," philanthropist Michael Steinhardt said at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's "Bay St. Meets Wall St." event on May 21.

While Steinhardt continues to support Israel, he's critical of the direction it's heading.

"If you were a 17-year-old Israeli, who would your role model be?" he asked the crowd of some 200 people.

"I feel so upset that Israel is going on such a poor path… Israeli academics are leaving [Israel.] That's scary."

Steinhardt, a philanthropist who made his fortune as a hedge fund manager, co-founded Birthright – which offers free trips to Israel for Jews aged 18 to 26 – in 1999 and has also supported many other organizations in the Jewish community. He spoke about business and philanthropy at the Design Exchange on Bay Street.

Steinhardt left his Wall Street career in 1995 to devote his time to the Jewish community.

"Somehow the idea of spending a lot of time making money didn't fit my idea of values," he said.

"The Jewish world always interested me. I started working for day schools and became the co-chair of [the campus group] Hillel."

In 1998, Steinhardt approached fellow philanthropist Charles Bronfman about his idea for Birthright. Bronfman had already founded an organization called Israel Experience, which was sending high school students to Israel, but was not flourishing.

"I spoke to [Bronfman] about Birthright. He was awed by the magnitude of the idea, but he said, 'Let's try it.'"

When introducing Steinhardt, Bruce Leboff, who chairs federation's "Bay St. Cabinet," spoke about Birthright's success.

"By the end of the summer, a quarter of a million people will have been brought to Israel [on Birthright trips]," Leboff said. "Mr. Steinhardt is a great example of someone who gives of himself."

Event chair Evan Cooperman explained how Birthright influenced his life.

"The main reason I'm involved in the Jewish community is Michael Steinhardt," he said.

In 2000, Cooperman went on a Birthright trip and the tour guide asked him to share his dreams for the future.

He had an epiphany.

"I realized that most of my dreams centered on being successful and making a lot of money," he said.

Cooperman also realized that he needed to give back to his community.

"Michael Steinhardt gave me a free trip to Israel. [He] really connected me to the land and [encouraged] me to give back," he said.

Steinhardt said he co-founded Birthright for just that reason.

"To many [participants,] it's the largest monetary gift they've ever received. It touches off a spark. So many are vulnerable because they know so little. [I'm] trying to create fire from the spark," Steinhardt said.

When asked about the lack of charitable donations to Jewish causes, Steinhardt was blunt.

"Fifteen per cent of philanthropy [by Jews goes] to the Jewish world. This is not an accident," he said. "We give where our heart is. Our heart isn't so Jewish anymore."

Leboff said Steinhardt's heart is in Israel.

"He works towards revitalizing the Jewish identity to reach out to all Jews," he said.

Shocked and wary

After the surprise announcement last week that Israel and Syria had agreed to indirect discussions through the offices of the Turkish government, Iran's leadership was reported to have been "in shock." Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was said to have been "stunned" and "furious" at the news.

Judging by much of the Israeli media's reaction to the announcement, it seems a great many Israelis were also in shock. A poll conducted by Channel 2 television found that fully 70 per cent of Israelis are opposed to relinquishing the Golan Heights, even under the umbrella of a comprehensive peace accord.

In addition to the overwhelming opposition to quitting the Golan, most Israelis also suspect the bona fides of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's surprise announcement. Some 57 per cent think the talks are linked to the ongoing police investigation into the allegations that the prime minister accepted bribes from an American businessman while serving in previous government posts.

Syria's main objective in a peace treaty with Israel would be to retrieve the entire Golan Heights, the high basalt plateau north and east of the Sea of Galilee that it lost in the Six Day War. Israel's key objective would be to finally normalize relations with Syria and to pull Syria out of the Iranian orbit and away from Hamas, Hezbollah and all other radical Palestinians.

Talks are slated to take place in Istanbul in the near future.

But no sooner had the first stories appeared than the respective leaders tried to pull back to earth the skyrocketing expectations from the surprise announcement. Syrian Defence Minister Hassan Turkmani began an official visit to Iran Saturday at the invitation of Iranian Defence Minister Mostafa Mohammed Najjar. More likely, he was summoned to Tehran to explain Syria's "betrayal" of its Shia sponsor specifically and of the Islamic cause in general.

For his part, Prime Minister Olmert tried to assuage a skeptical and doubting populace on Sunday by implying that he would not necessarily accept previous governments' purported willingness to give back all or most of the Heights to the Syrians. "There are and will be very precise and meticulous preparations, to bring our expectations of the negotiations into line with today's reality, not that of 10 or nine years ago, and with the security and political sensitivities that stem from current realities and not from what we knew in the past. We will conduct serious and responsible negotiations, with all due caution."

It is not likely that Olmert's words were much of a balm to the itchy feeling most Israelis have at the thought of trusting the Syrians. Public pronouncements aside, Olmert knows that for any negotiations to yield positive results, he must tread very warily and always with the backing of a significant majority of his own people. For the moment, at least, that support is not there. Merely that old, familiar, uneasy itch that will not be salved.

Cotler's Israel motion didn't pass

The motion of support that reaffirms and re-articulates the unique bond between Canada and Israel, put forward by MP Irwin Cotler in the House of Commons on May 7, did not, as you suggested, receive unanimous support and was, therefore, not passed by the House ("Gratifying and grateful," CJN, May 15).

I wonder what happened? Who were the M's who voted against the motion? What parties do they represent? This is not idle curiosity. In advancing our causes, we are entitled to know who are our supporters and who are our detractors. These detractors are certainly entitled to their negative votes, but why must they remain anonymous?

Israeli and Palestinian narratives

As columnist Jesse Mintz asserts, it is true that there are chasms in the Israeli and Palestinian narratives and the new historians try to ostensibly address them ("Sixty years later," CJN, May 1). However, the real motive of some of the new historians, such as Illan Pappe, is to further their far-left ideology. Prof. Pappe has even been on record as saying the "facts matter less than the ideology."

Regardless, these post-Zionist historians have been busy uncovering perceived and real Israeli misdeeds as a way to bridge narratives. However, the problem is that as Israelis become more sensitized to Palestinian suffering (much of it self-inflicted), there has been little acknowledgment by the other side of Jewish suffering. Deir Yassin reaches mythical proportions, not unlike the deplorable attempts made to do the same for Jenin in 2002. The massacres of Jews in Hebron in 1929, the Arab riots and killing of Jews in 1936, the massacre at Gush Etzion and of Hadassah medical workers in 1948 are obliterated from the Palestinian narrative. Or more importantly, there is no acknowledgment of the invasion of Arab armies in 1948 in the Arabs' quest to destroy the nascent Jewish state. War just "broke out."

While one side tries to address some of the unpleasant facts of history, the other side deviates more from the irrefutable truth and revises it to meet its ideological objective – the elimination of the Jewish state. In fact, in many ways, the Palestinian narrative has become more extreme, attaching false labels to the Jewish state, such as "apartheid" and "ethnic cleansing," that do not hold up under honest scrutiny.

Reconciliation will come when both sides, not just one, address historical truths.

Talking to the enemy

U.S. President George W. Bush sure picked the wrong place to equate talking to Hamas terrorists with Nazi appeasement ("President Bush visits Masada – U.S., Israel want 'tangible action' on Iran nukes," CJN, May 22). It was Israel's top warrior, the late Gen. Moshe Dayan, who could hardly be called an appeaser, who said: "If you want peace, you don't talk to your friends. You talk to your enemies." And someone should whisper these wise words of former U.S. president John F. Kennedy's in Bush's ear: "Let us never negotiate out of fear. But, let us never fear to negotiate."

B'nai Brith expulsions

Kudos to Rafi Aaron for having the courage to condemn the expulsion of Lou Ronson, a man of integrity, from B'nai Brith Canada ("B'nai Brith expulsion," CJN letters, May 8). However, there are a few more very important members of Upper Canada Lodge who were also expelled: Sid Isenberg (incoming president of the lodge for 2008), who, incidentally never received a notice of expulsion from B'nai Brith; Mark Mittleman (past president), and Lloyd Lindsay (incoming third vice-president for 2008). Is it possible that B'nai Brith Canada is afraid of new blood and new ideas, and the possibility that the organization may return to democracy and transparency?

Disagrees with letter writer

My answer to Bernard Katz's inane, thoughtless and ignorant tirade about Israel, in which he writes that "Israel must stop double dealing, stop pretending to seek peace while travelling the same old paths of dishonour, immortality and death," is, "Nuts" ("Re-branding Israel," CJN letters, May 22). This is the same answer that Gen. Anthony McAuliffe, the defending general during the Battle of the Bulge, gave the Germans when they demanded that the Americans surrender.

Perspectives

Can Israel and Syria get to peace?

By ZVI BAR'EL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

A day after Israel and Syria announced a renewal of peace talks after an eight-year hiatus, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner that both sides know what they need to do for peace.

"The Syrians know what we want, and we know what they want," Olmert told Kouchner.

Olmert told the French foreign minister last Thursday that talks with Syria would not detract from peace efforts on the Palestinian front, saying, "Israel intends to hold parallel peace talks [with the Palestinian Authority and Syria] without having one set of talks take precedence over the other."

The prime minister also said that Israel still hopes to reach a peace deal with the Palestinians by the end of 2008. He said that his meetings with PA President Mahmoud Abbas, and the meetings Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni has held with top Palestinian negotiator Ahmed Qureia, have been focused and serious.

Syrian President Bashar Assad

Earlier Thursday, Livni said Syria must distance itself from Tehran and cut ties to Iranian-backed groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas if it wants to conclude a peace treaty with Israel.

"Israel wants to live in peace with its neighbours, but Syria also needs to understand that it needs also full renunciation of supporting terror – Hezbollah, Hamas and of course Iran," Livni said in English.

Continuing her remarks to reporters in Hebrew, Livni called Syria's ties with Iran "problematic," referring to the Israel's accusations that the Islamic Republic sponsors Hamas and Lebanese guerrilla group Hezbollah.

"The Syrians also need to understand that… they must distance themselves completely from their… problematic ties with Iran," she said in Hebrew before the start of a meeting with Kouchner.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak addressed the talks in public for the first time last Thursday, tempering high hopes by saying that the road to peace is long.

"The Syrians know that concessions are a two-way street, and the distance from here to a peace agreement is vast," Barak said, speaking at a ceremony of appreciation for Israel Defence Forces reservists at the president's residence in Jerusalem.

"Peace will come only from a position of power and security," Barak said.

Deputy Israeli Prime Minister Haim Ramon also met with Kouchner and told him that while Israel is ready to make painful concessions for peace, a deal won't be reached if Damascus continues to give support to Hezbollah and Hamas, and to serve as Iran's central ally.

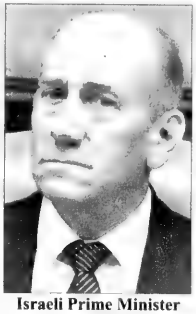
Also on Thursday, Al-Hayat, a London-based Arabic newspaper, printed an interview with Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem, who said that an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan is not only a Syrian demand, but a Syrian right.

"Syria won't advance negotiations without a commitment to a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights." He also said that he hopes Israel will display seriousness in the indirect peace talks that have been launched between Jerusalem and Damascus, so that the discussions can develop into direct talks.

At Syria's insistence, the talks will initially be indirect, with a Turkish mediator shuffling between the two sides. However, Ankara is impressed by the present upbeat mood in the talks and hopes that by next month, the time might be ripe for a direct meeting between Israelis and Syrians, a senior Turkish official said.

The official, who is involved in the Turkish mediation, said last week's meetings in Ankara dealt mainly with "selecting issues for debate and refreshing the issues in agreement."

The Turkish mediator in the talks is Ahmet Davutoglu, chief adviser to the Turkish prime minister on foreign policy. Davotoglu scurried from one office to another last week, passing messages between the two sides.



Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert

Davotoglu has recently visited Damascus several times, meeting senior Syrian officials including, Vice-President Farouk Shara and foreign ministry legal adviser Riad Daoudi.

Daoudi, who probably headed the Syrian delegation for the talks with Israel in Turkey, conducted talks with Turkey on Israel in the past year. He also dealt with the international investigation into the murder in 2005 of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

Syria is presenting the talks in Turkey as President Bashar Assad's achievement.

Syrian commentators said on Arab television that the talks were being conducted according to Assad's terms: they were held in public, were based on the Madrid Conference that set the terms of Israeli withdrawal, adopted Israel's willingness expressed in 1995 to withdraw from the Golan in exchange for full peace and were not conditioned, at least at this stage, on a Syrian disengagement from Iran, Hezbollah or the Palestinian organizations in Damascus.

The Turkish mediation efforts have been going on for more than a year. Turkey is trying to prevent Syria's isolation and curb Iran's influence in the Middle East and assumes that it would be easier to achieve peace between Israel and Syria than between Israel and the Palestinians. Turkey went ahead with the talks over U.S. objections.

"We understood the American displeasure, but we are acting in Turkish interests rather than American ones," the Turkish official said.

Asked if Washington had pressured Ankara to block the move with Syria, he said Washington made its position clear "and we made ours clear. I'm sure Washington will be pleased with advancing the process. After all, it is supposed to be the 'honest broker' that Assad is looking for."

A Turkish government source told Ha'aretz that Turkey could lead the mediation a certain way but cannot replace the United States. "It's like a relay race. We do our section, and if it succeeds we pass the baton to the Americans," he said.

Another Turkish source said the talks may serve interests other than the peace process itself.

"[Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan] is under threat to have his party outlawed over his remarks on women's headcoverings, Olmert is tied up in investigations, and Assad needs to break out of his international isolation and the Hariri murder entanglement. A bit of commotion over the peace process will do none of them any harm," a government official said.

The dividing issues

By AKIVA ELDAR
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The gap between the Syrian and Israeli positions lies in Damascus' demand for Israel's withdrawal to the July 4, 1967, lines and Jerusalem's stance that any withdrawal must be to the international border set by Britain and France in the early 1920s.

On the ground, this gap is just several hundred metres, but the sticking point is Syria's demand for land reaching all the way to the northeastern shore of the Kinneret, which it seized in 1948. By contrast, Israel wants to retain a narrow strip of land there, as per the agreement between Britain and France, and the 1947 United Nations Partition Plan.

Unofficial contacts between the two sides via a Swiss intermediary, which lasted until the summer of 2006 and were driven by former Israeli Foreign Ministry director general Alon Liel, resulted in an agreement that the disputed area between the 1967 lines and the international border would be part of a "peace park" that would cover the entire Golan Heights. The Syrians agreed that Israelis would be able to visit the park during the day without any entry requirements.

Meanwhile, Syrian President Bashar Assad demanded that Israel honour a pledge by former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin to the United States that if all of Israel's demands were met, it would withdraw to the 1967 lines.

The talks between the two sides include a range of issues, all of which will play a key role in the success of negotiations, to varying degrees.

Water resources

Syria, which suffers from water shortages, recently told former U.S. president Jimmy Carter that it is willing to commit that it will not draw water from the Kinneret, but it expects financial assistance for desalination plants and a commitment from Turkey that it will supply Syria with water.

Evacuation of settlements

In previous contacts between Israel and Syria, a rift emerged between the sides over a timetable for the removal of Israeli communities on the Golan Heights. Israel requested a 15-year period to evacuate settlements, while Syria envisioned a period of 10 years for removal of these communities.

Syria's ties to Iran, Hezbollah and radical Palestinian groups, including Hamas

Israel insisted that Syria commits in advance to sever ties with these parties, while Damascus maintained that this issue should be on the negotiating table with all other issues. In effect, Syria has rejected any preconditions in the talks.

American involvement

Syria is standing by its request for U.S. involvement in the negotiations, and wants the United States to change its attitude to Damascus, and for U.S. President George W. Bush's to remove Syria from inclusion in his so-called "axis of evil" (along with Iran and North Korea).

Demilitarization of Syrian territory east of the agreed border

Syria previously demanded that Israel also create a demilitarized zone on Israeli territory. An agreement on the extent of the two zones has not been reached.

Normalization of ties

Syria backed an Arab League resolution decision first adopted in 2002 at the Beirut conference to normalize ties with Israel in return for a complete withdrawal from all Arab lands captured in 1967. It's unclear if Syria would agree to the normalization requested by Israel before it cedes the West Bank and east Jerusalem as part of a peace deal with the Palestinians.

Golan Heights

The Golan Heights Law, which passed in 1981, confirmed Israel's annexation of the Golan. This law could make it difficult for the government to get Knesset approval for settlement evacuation or withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

Back in their days as Israeli prime minister, both Rabin and Ehud Barak promised to bring any agreement with Syria to a referendum.

Opinions

Harmful decisions

Rabbi Irving (Yitz) Greenberg, the distinguished exponent of contemporary Judaism, is quoted to have said that it doesn't matter which denomination you belong to – as long as you are ashamed of it.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Many Conservative rabbis in Canada have been ashamed of their movement for some time now. They cite among their reasons the ordination of women by the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) and the admission of gay and lesbian students into its rabbinic program.

JTS professor Jack Wertheimer probably had this in mind when, speaking at a conference in Jerusalem last December, he expressed his disappointment that the Conservative movement has been so keen to compete with Reform for members that it has failed to provide a relevant, halachic alternative.

To express their dissent, several Conservative rabbis in Toronto have been active members of the Union for Traditional Judaism, where many disaffected Conservative Jews have sought refuge.

Now, some of the congregations they serve have done what Shaar Hashomayim Congregation in Montreal did years ago. They have seceded from the parent body of Conservative Judaism in North America.

Rabbi Steven Saltzman, of Adath Israel Congregation, explained the secession of his congregation ideologically. He spoke of the growing chasm between Conservative Judaism in America and its Canadian branch, with special reference to the ordination of women and homosexuals, and the tendency to emulate American Reform in accepting as Jews the offspring of a Jewish father and a non-Jewish mother.

Lay leaders of the congregations that have left tend to give more mundane reasons. They cite the cost of affiliation and say they don't get as much back from the movement as they put into it. A spokesperson for Beth Tzedec Congregation, Canada's largest Conservative shul, said openly that "the Conservative movement's ideology did not enter into the synagogue's decision."

To wish to leave for ideological reasons may be misguided, because it would serve the cause better if they all stayed within the proverbial tent, but it is honorable. To leave in order not to pay affiliation fees reflects a deplorable, crass parochialism that eschews responsibility for the collective.

It's bound to bring great harm to Canadian Jewry. For it can only be a matter of time before the JTS will make it very difficult, if not impossible, for congregations outside the Conservative movement to employ its graduates. The successors to those who currently serve the seceding congregations are, therefore, likely to be Orthodox. Liberal Jews seeking a traditional environment may be rendered religiously homeless.

As a liberal traditionalist Reform rabbi, I should be happy, because of the potential influx of new members to our congregations. But as a Jew in Canada, I am saddened by yet another unwarranted step to move the community to the right.

Young leaders are embracing the right

Inside the Jewish student community, a debate is raging over which political party is the best for our community.

I came face-to-face with this debate in November when I attended a conference hosted by the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), a multi-partisan group with the mandate of engaging the Jewish community in Canadian politics.

Mark Masters in Ottawa

The scene startled me because there used to be no debate over who the Jewish community should vote for. The answer was the Liberal Party of Canada. That support for the Grits still exists in our community today, but if the new wave of young leaders is any indication, there will be much more debate about it in the years ahead.

Young people historically have tilted toward apathy rather than political involvement. With the barrage of issues facing high school and university students, that's no surprise. For the most part, outside perhaps the context of an election campaign, young people just don't care that much. Those who do care tend to be on the left side of political spectrum.

The CJPAC conference featured several days of meetings with guest speakers and workshops meant to make Jewish students better political advocates for Israel and the other issues important to our community.

What stood out was the breakdown in party affiliation. The division was basically 50-50 between Liberal supporters and Tory backers. In years past, this was unheard of among a young crowd. Historically, Conservatives were in the minority and not exactly outspoken about their leanings.

But at this conference, the Conservative supporters were more vocal and aggressive in their arguments. Perhaps this was a byproduct of the party being in power for the first time in a long while. More likely, however, this new-found vigour was a response to the pride felt by the party's unfailing support for the Jewish state.

For years under Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, we saw Canada support one-sided anti-Israel resolutions at the United Nations. Then Liberal Prime Minister Paul Martin came in, and Canada started to abstain on the resolutions.

When Stephen Harper and the Tories won a minority government in 2006, many in the Jewish community were unsure of what to expect. What they got was the strongest advocate for Israel to ever live at 24 Sussex Dr.

Time and time again, Harper has come to Israel's defence, and the position he takes on this issue seems truly rooted in principle.

Our current political climate of minority government makes it very attractive for leaders to take on populist themes that win votes.

Standing up for Israel is not necessarily a vote getter. The Jewish population is only a significant factor in a handful of Canada's 308 ridings. On top of this, in seat-rich Quebec being pro-Israel is far from a popular position.

That said, groups like CJPAC are doing a solid job of ensuring our issues are on the agenda.

What was striking about the conference in November was despite the varying political beliefs there was a common goal shared by all involved to ensure our community and Israel has its voice heard by Canadian leaders and the general population.

There was a passion for politics, and Jewish political issues, that I had never seen before.

What is clear is that the bar for support from our community has been raised.

The current wave of young Jews are making the issue of Israel central to them because for the first time since the Yom Kippur War the country's future seems truly uncertain. Due to this we are demanding more from our leaders, and we are doing it in more practical ways.

Programs such as the Hasbara Fellowships and CJPAC student conferences are helping connect Jewish youths with the political process.

There are still some Jewish students who are uninterested in politics and maybe they will never find it a worthwhile pursuit. However, I challenge them to get involved because those who fail to get engaged will miss out on a crucial time in our community's political development.

Politics is no longer a nuisance for Jewish students – it is now a necessity.

Peace will be Israel's best achievement

It took 2,000 years to dream of it, 60 years to plan it and 60 more to bring it to life. The modern state of Israel is celebrating its 60th anniversary with great pride in its achievements and with the knowledge that its story, like that of any other democratic society, remains unfinished. We Israelis live in a region filled with great instability and anxiety, but we will never give up our hope for peace.

Reda Mansour in Atlanta

Israel is a small place, no bigger than any state in the American South. Yet its people represent a brave and ancient nation with a dynamic soul. Today, Israel ranks among the world's 25 most advanced nations. In 1995, it was the first country to sign a free trade agreement with both the United States and Europe. Israel is the only non-European Union state to be included in the EU science program, and was recently announced as a candidate for the prestigious Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

Israelis believe that anything can be possible. This was our belief from the moment our first immigrants entered the Promised Land in the late 19th century, and it continues to drive us today.

The strongest internal calling of contemporary Israelis echoes the desire of early Zionist thinker Achad Ha'am (1856-1927): to fulfil Israel's destiny as "a light unto the nations." Achad Ha'am's essential idea to create an intellectual hub in the Promised Land still motivates the Israeli spirit of innovation and generosity.

This is the attitude behind the Israel of scientific achievement, the powerhouse of innovation that created the smallest satellites in the sky, the smallest pill cameras, and technologies that are incorporated into every cellphone and personal computer. Israel leads the world in the number of patents registered and high-tech firms per capita.

Israelis do not dwell on their security problems. Since the early 1950s, they have journeyed throughout the developing world to share their technological expertise. When aid recipients from the Amazon to Southeast Asia refer to Israel as a superpower, it has nothing to do with its military power. To them, Israel is a superpower because it sends them engineers to help them acquire drinking water or doctors to help them treat diseases.

In spite of these achievements, the Israelis have yet to attain what will be their greatest accomplishment. They long for the day when they will live peacefully and securely alongside a stable, prosperous Palestinian state. Peace is the desire of the Israelis, and it is what we wish for all our children over the next 60 years – Palestinians and Israelis, Arabs and Jews alike.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is one of many conflicts in the area stretching from the Persian Gulf to northern Africa. There are those who are determined to turn the Middle East into the centre of a global clash of civilizations. Israel, however, will use its next 60 years as it used its first 60 – working to achieve the dream of peace and stability.

Our history gives us hope as it teaches us that people of good faith do have the power to implement their dreams. Our peaceful wishes and positive thinking might make us seem weak to tyrants, but Israel will prove that the victory of peace over hate is inevitable.

Jerusalem — a city of two solitudes

Jerusalem, the capital of Israel and the spiritual centre of the Jewish people, is a world unto itself. Officially unified and indivisible, Jerusalem is actually two separate cities, composed of Jewish and Palestinian Arab neighbourhoods whose residents hardly mingle, let alone socialize. Flushed with victory in the Six Day War, Israel annexed east Jerusalem – inhabited by Arab Muslims and Arab and Armenian Christians – in 1967. Israel also greatly expanded Jerusalem's boundaries, grafting territory from the West Bank, and built entirely new neighbourhoods such as Ramot Eshkol and French Hill. In a further fait accompli, Israel fused these diverse districts with western Jerusalem, which has been in Jewish hands since statehood in 1948.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

Almost 41 years have elapsed since its amalgamation, yet Jerusalem remains two solitudes, near and yet so far from each other. Neither the Arabs nor the international community have recognized the dramatic changes on the ground, claiming that Jerusalem's status should be resolved through negotiations rather than unilateral measures.

A city of striking contrasts cutting across ethnic, religious, geographic and cultural lines, Jerusalem expresses itself through jolting differences.

From the terrace of the venerable King David Hotel – an oasis of calm and elegance whose guest list is the acme of celebrity – the view of the walled Old City is one to be savoured. Kings, presidents, diplomats and movie stars have glided through its marbled halls, touched by the gravity of history.

The first British high commissioner in Mandate Palestine, Herbert Samuel, was here, as were Jimmy Carter, the president of the United States; Moshe Dayan, Israel's defence minister before and after the Six Day War; the Hollywood actors Kirk Douglas and Elizabeth Taylor; and King Hussein of Jordan. Their autographed names, and that of other luminaries, line the floor of a hall adjacent to the terrace.

Several blocks away, in the David Citadel Hotel, a much newer hostelry minutes by foot from the American consulate, spiffily dressed modern Orthodox Jews from the United States congregate in the lobby, watching a photographer and his assistant snap pictures of a newly minted bar mitzvah boy.

Across the road and up a flight of steps, the brand-name shops and cafés of the Mamilla promenade beckon. Once a mixed Jewish Arab commercial district, Mamilla fell into steep decline following the War of Independence, being on the edge of Israel's armistice line with Jordan. After decades of heated debate, Mamilla was finally rehabilitated. The project, designed in part by the Israeli Canadian architect Moshe Safdie, was expected to be completed before Israel's 60th anniversary celebrations.

When the founder of political Zionism, Theodor Herzl, visited Palestine in 1898, for the first and only time, he stayed in a modest inn. Having been renovated, it is an integral component of the Mamilla project, which is literally steps away from the Jaffa Gate. The venerable gate leads to the labyrinthine, cobblestone alleys of the Old City, a mix of various quarters.

The compact Armenian quarter melts into the larger and vastly refurbished Jewish quarter, which was virtually destroyed by the Arab Legion in the 1948 war. A warren of residential and institutional buildings, yeshivas, schools and synagogues, it has returned to life with a bounce since the Six Day War.

The Jewish quarter looks down at the Second Temple era Western Wall, where haredi Jews, mainstream Orthodox Jews and secular Jews converge as probably nowhere else. Beyond the wall is the golden dome of the Temple Mount, the hotly contested historical compound in the Muslim quarter.

The Muslim quarter is next door to the Western Wall, but it may as well be light years away, particularly on the Jewish Sabbath. As Jews pray and meditate, some stuffing personal notes into the crevices of the wall, Muslims go about their business. The merchants of the Muslim quarter dispense kitschy souvenirs, T-shirts, bangles and beads, spices, fruits and vegetables, Arabic pastry slathered in honey, and meat and fish.

The strong aroma of frying oil emanates from the stalls of falafel makers, permeating the air. Arab vendors sell bagels sprinkled with sesame seeds and dipped in zaatar.

The Israeli police presence is light.

Christian pilgrims, many of whom are Russians, follow monks as they walk past the stations of the cross along the Via Dolorosa, the path that led Jesus to his crucifixion.

The interior of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which has been a pilgrimage destination since the crucifixion of Jesus, is murky and redolent of burning candles and incense. Pilgrims kneel or prostrate themselves at an altar, mouthing incantations.

The fairy-tale gold onion domes of the Church of Mary Magdalene, dedicated in 1888, glitter in the bright sunshine. Its cool, shaded garden is filled with Russian Orthodox visitors. Prior to the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991, few Russian pilgrims ever set foot in Israel. For the past few years, however, Israel has been deluged by them.

Jerusalem as seen from Mount Scopus

Mount Scopus, an Israeli enclave in Jordanian territory before 1967, houses a satellite campus of the Hebrew University. From a bluff, the parched Judean Desert is clearly visible. The haze obscures the Dead Sea, the lowest body of water on earth.

On the other side of town, near the Damascus Gate, lies the American Colony Hotel, one of the first hotels during the Ottoman epoch to cater to European travellers and now a haunt of western journalists. Its courtyard is bedecked with flowers and shrubs. Its patio café is a peaceful redoubt from the clamour and tumult of the Old City.

The Ottoman walls around the Old City, softly golden in the late afternoon, are crowned by a catwalk that offers a bird's eye perspective of both sides of Jerusalem. Most visitors remain blissfully unaware of the rampart, but for a nominal admission fee of $4, you can stroll along its serpentine length, catching sight of various attractions.

Sultan's Pool, an ancient reservoir, is now a venue of outdoor concerts. The Church of Dormition, the supposed site of the Virgin Mary's death, is where the mythical Last Supper is said to have unfolded. Montefiore's windmill, a charming artifact, was built in the mid-19th century by Moses Montefiore – a British Jewish philanthropist – to serve the milling needs of the residents of Yemin Moshe, a community designed to relieve overcrowding in the Old City. A replica of the coach he used while in Palestine is inside a glass case.

A replica of Philadelphia's storied Liberty Bell is found at Liberty Bell Park, one of Jerusalem's finest green spaces and a stone's throw from Montefiore's windmill. Opened in 1976 to mark the bicentennial of the United States, the park is studded with gnarled olive trees, which are exquisite down to the last details.

The German Colony, settled in the 1870s by German evangelical Christians known as Templers, is one of the most affluent neighbourhoods in Jerusalem. Ehud Olmert, Israel's prime minister, bought a villa here.

The last Templers left Jerusalem long ago, but their simple yet beautiful homes, typified by white stone facades, red tiled roofs, green wooden shutters and nameplates, have been renovated in a frenzy of gentrification.

Several of these quaint buildings are on Emek Refaim, a hip thoroughfare filled with cozy cafés, restaurants and boutiques. The contrast between the German Colony and, say, Mea Shearim – a bastion of haredi Jews that reminds one of an eastern European shtetl – could not be wider, to say the very least.

CHAT students name south campus

Dedicated in memory of Raoul Wallenberg

Grade 11 student Ariel Muskat-Brown casts her ballot during the vote to rename Tanenbaum-CHAT's south campus.

Students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's south campus voted last week to name the branch TanenbaumCHAT – Wallenberg Campus in memory of Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who is credited with saving thousands of Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust.

The name was chosen after a committee of administrators, board members, teachers and students selected five finalists from some 200 nominations received, representing about 100 names.

The four other finalists were Hebrew-language novelist and Nobel Laureate S.Y. Agnon, Spanish Jewish poet and philosopher Yehuda HaLevi, former Israeli ambassador to Canada Yaakov Herzog, and World War II Jewish resistance leader Hannah Senesh.

Criteria for the name included the necessity of it reflecting school and community values; being a dignified name for the school, and user friendliness.

The naming came about after the school received a $4-million donation, through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, from a private donor family that has children attending the school.

Although the gift would have enabled the donors to name the campus, located on Wilmington Avenue in Bathurst Manor, they asked that the school choose a distinguished name from Jewish history.

Paul Shaviv, Tanenbaum CHAT's director of education, said that choosing a name "energized the school community. It has been an educational experience, and a lot of fun."

The donor family said the naming process was an educational opportunity, in which students learned in detail about the lives of the five finalists and decided which person best reflected the characteristics of their own school.

"We are delighted that so many students, parents and staff participated, and we heard with fascination about the many discussions and debates that occurred around family tables," the family said in a statement.

"We hope that the name process demonstrates how tzedakah can be in itself an educational opportunity for individuals, families and the whole community."

Chabad launches new Hebrew schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Two Toronto Chabad locations – Chabad on the Avenue and Chabad of York Mills – are launching Hebrew schools this fall that will use a Chabad system based on martial arts belt levels to teach Hebrew reading.

Chabad on the Avenue's school, Aleph Champ Hebrew School, which will be housed at Ledbury Park Elementary School, is named for the system. "Aleph Champ" was inspired by an American Chabad Hebrew school director's experience as a karate student.

Chabad of York Mills' school will have an added focus, reflected in its name, the Bayview Hebrew School of the Arts.

Chana Gansburg, director of Aleph Champ Hebrew School, shows some of the materials to be used in the Aleph Champ program for teaching Hebrew reading.
[Frances Kraft photo]

Under the Aleph Champ system, children are divided into 10 different levels according to their ability to read Hebrew. Each level has a colour, and children receive a medal when they complete each level, in the same way that martial arts students receive a different colour belt to mark each level of achievement.

Chana Gansburg, director of Aleph Champ Hebrew School, said the system, which takes students through the aleph-bet one letter at a time, is "extremely motivating." Students proceed at their own pace and start at their own level, although they are in classes with children their own age who may be at different levels of Hebrew reading.

They are issued an "Aleph Champ" timer, and their reading ability is tested after each letter.

The first lesson couldn't be more basic, featuring the letter "aleph" but no vowels. With time, students learn to read familiar English words transliterated into Hebrew, and then Hebrew words that they will use in prayer services and that relate to Jewish life.

The program is not meant to teach conversational Hebrew, said Gansburg. She added, however, that if there is a core group of at least four or five students who achieve "black belt" (or black medal) status, a Hebrew-language program could be created for them.

Rather, said her husband, Rabbi Menachem Gansburg, the emphasis will be on words associated with Jewish holidays and "anything they're going to come across when practising as a Jew." The Gansburgs, like all Chabad couples, work as a team.

"Once they really master the reading, we go up to prayers," Chana Gansburg said. The highest levels focus on prayer and the significance of the prayers, she added.

The school, which has an annual tuition of $525, will run two hours at a time, of which 45 minutes to an hour will be devoted to the Aleph Champ method. Students will attend either on Wednesdays or Sundays. "There will also be Bible stories, holidays, songs, drama and all the stuff other Hebrew schools have," she said.

Above all, the Gansburgs want to create a positive experience for the students. "Bad Jewish experiences make you want to disassociate yourself from those Jewish experiences," said the rabbi, who hopes to see the same type of enthusiasm students display at hockey award nights when the school year culminates in an Aleph Champ award night.

Rabbi Levi Gansburg of Chabad of York Mills (Rabbi Menachem's brother), whose wife Rivky is director of the Bayview Hebrew School for the Arts, said the curriculum at the school will be taught using song, art and drama.

Classes, which will serve students from ages four to 13, will be held at Crescent School on Sundays only. Annual tuition is $600.

"If [students] enjoy what they're doing, they'll come back for more," he said. "I think Aleph Champ is unique and innovative, and the arts [component] is unique and innovative."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Choosing schools with few Jews

By DANIEL HELD

As the school year slowly comes to a close, students and teachers alike are making plans for the summer and next year. Among the most excited – and the most scared – are the Grade 12 students who will shortly be leaving high school and heading to university. It is during this time of year that they are accepted to universities and they, in turn, accept their spot at college.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

When I graduated high school, the majority of my peers stayed in Toronto – studying mainly at the University of Toronto or York University – and a minority went to "traditional" out-of-town schools – most notably McGill University and the University of Western Ontario. Today, however, a significant change has taken place as students are increasingly leaving town for university.

Significant growth in Jewish population has taken place not only in the traditional out-of-town schools, which have expanded to include Queen's and Dalhousie universities and others, but recently I have noticed a growing number of students accepting places at a new set of schools such as Guelph, Wilfred Laurier and Waterloo universities.

As a greater number of students attend universities with smaller Jewish populations, our community will be forced to reinvent our system of Hillels in order to provide services to these students. Inculcating Jewish life on emerging campuses must become a priority to meet the change in our universities' demographics.

The most significant impact of this new trend, however, will come upon the students' graduation from university and return home. On several occasions, I have been quoted expressing frustration that many young Jews simply follow in the Jewish footprints of their parents.

Staying at home for university, students go to the same shul their parents go to (or don't go to) they have the same Shabbat dinner and celebrate the holidays in the same way. Doing so, these students never take ownership of Judaism – they never make it their own. In contrast to American Jewish life in which prayer, spirituality and Shabbat are constantly being reinvented on college campuses, the Canadian experience has been one of relative conservatism.

As Jewish students leave home for university, they are forced to, for the first time, make Jewish decisions for themselves: Will I go to, or host, a Shabbat dinner? Will I go to synagogue – what kind, with whom? Will I keep kosher, be vegetarian, refrain from certain foods? What will I do for the holidays – go home, find a local synagogue, celebrate with friends?

The process of making these decisions and the journey of Jewish self-discovery that the students experience along the way will inform our Jewish community upon their return from campus. Similar to the American experience, innovations incubated on college campuses will slowly weave themselves into the fabric of our own community, enriching our existing organizations and forming new ones.

A few months ago, I wrote an article about the lack of appeal many of our synagogues have to youth. At the time I was, justifiably, criticized for offering objections without suggestions. Here is one.

Leave the synagogue building behind and go out into the field. Our synagogues need to reach out to students on university campuses across the country. We must spend Shabbatot on campuses in Guelph, Halifax and Kingston, and work with the students, campus professionals and local communities in shaping meaningful Jewish experiences. We need to learn from the success of the Chabad model and offer comfortable, warm and welcoming Jewish homes on campus, which will extend back home when the students graduate. We need to help our campuses become settings for Jewish creativity, engagement and experimentation.

If our synagogues partner with student leaders and Hillel professionals to transform the campus into incubators of a creative and dynamic Jewish life, they will guarantee their position as the cornerstone of the continued Jewish commitment of returning students.

Don't call them Arab Jews

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

In Israel, Jews of Iraqi descent have distinguished themselves among Sephardim. They can rightfully take pride in their accomplishments, for they as a community have firmly entrenched themselves in the middle and upper middle classes of Israeli society.

This is in no way a recent development, but something they attained just a decade after their arrival.

As members of one of the oldest, and arguably the most stable, of all the Jewish Diasporas, the Jews of Iraq found themselves, after close to 2,000 years, unwelcome in their own land. After Israel's declaration of statehood in 1948, the Jews of Iraq felt that they were collectively castigated for this rebirth of Israel.

Most of Iraqi Jewry made aliyah during the early 1950s. This was the culmination of a community numbering well over 100,000 people. Within a relatively short period of time, they managed to solidly establish themselves, successfully integrating into their new nation.

This happened during a particularly difficult time – a nascent state, one at war, was flooded with immigrants with precious few resources to go around.

While the rest of the Sephardi immigration of the 1950s, comprising mostly North Africans and Yemenites, went on to produce an underclass that still struggles to this day to pull itself together and to break a cycle of poverty, the Iraqi community, by and large, did not fall into the cracks of second-class citizenry.

This is not to say that they weren't met with the same sort of discrimination or racial prejudice that other Sephardim experienced – they certainly were. Iraqi Jews, like their Sephardi brethren who also made aliyah in the 1950s, were initially pushed to the periphery of the country, to places that today might be called development towns. At that time, however, one could not accurately describe these places as towns, or even as villages. They were bare settlements in the middle of nowhere.

While others complacently followed orders and did as they were told, Iraqi Jews did not. They instead settled in the centre of the country, particularly in the greater Tel Aviv area. The benefits of this fateful decision were quickly evident. In a cosmopolitan city, they became a unified bloc, one that made demands that their scattered brethren in the maabarot/tent cities could not even imagine, as the bare basics of life were to them a daily challenge.

It's no coincidence, then, that this past month's conference on Iraqi Jews took place at Tel Aviv University. All sorts of scholars – ranging from historians and literary specialists to sociologists – were invited.

Interestingly, the hot topic at the conference, the one that generated the most debate, was about self identification.

Not that Iraqi Jews are debating who they are, nor are they un-proud of their glorious heritage. Rather, the question centred on what Iraqi Jews wish to be called.

It was evident that the Iraqis are vehemently opposed to being referred to as Arab Jews. But even the Iraqi Jewish appellation is not fully embraced.

It seems that one of their naming preferences is Mizrachim – eastern Jews – as opposed to other Sephardim, who are sometimes called Ma'aravim – western Jews.

Another preference is Bavlim – Babylonians – as, in fact, their habitation of their land predated that of the Arabs.

But please, don't call me an Arab Jew.

Jewish Life

America's mental decay

The Age of American Unreason* by Susan Jacoby, Pantheon Books.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This book is about the dumbing down of America. The indictment isn't new. As far back as 1963, Richard Hofstadter was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for his challenging book Anti-Intellectualism in American Life. He decried the breakdown of reason and knowledge in the fields of politics, education and religion, and the general vulgarization of culture.

His troubling work was viewed as a cogent and powerful critique of American democracy.

Now, Susan Jacoby, a well-known author and journalist, picks up where Hofstadter left off. She reports on the widespread nature of junk thought, junk science, youth culture, celebrity culture, degradation of the language, television-screen technologies for infants, women's and African-American studies departments and innumeracy, as well as other forms of illiteracy. She is also concerned with the rise and multiple dangers of religious fundamentalism.

Quick to flaunt their patriotism, a surprising number of Americans know little about the constitution they venerate.

Asked whether they could recall any of the rights guaranteed by the First Amendment, a majority could name only freedom of speech. After that, only four in 10 could name freedom of religion and one in three, freedom of the press. Forty-two per cent think that the constitution explicitly states that the first language of the United States is English, and 25 per cent believe that Christianity was established by the constitution as the official government religion.

The young are even more ignorant than their parents and grandparents. About half of adults – but just 41 per cent of teenagers – can name the three branches of government. Only four in 10 adults – but just two in 10 teenagers – know that there are 100 U.S. senators.

How do Europeans differ from Americans in their attitude toward religion? Europeans have responded to modernity by becoming more rather than less skeptical about traditional religious dogma. Homosexuality, abortion, embryonic stem cell research and the teaching of evolution are simply not divisive political issues in most of Europe today.

They find it extraordinary that three times as many Americans believe in the virgin birth as in evolution. They fear that America "will go on a crusade" in the Muslim world or cut aid to poor countries lest it be used for birth control.

The author writes that to add to the muddle, it seems that Americans are as ignorant and poorly educated about the particulars of religion as they are about science. A majority of adults in what is supposedly the most religious nation in the developed world cannot name the four Gospels or identify Genesis as the first book of the Bible.

She writes, "How many citizens understand what creationism means, or make an informed decision about whether it belongs in classrooms, if they cannot even locate the source of the creation story?"

As might be expected, Jacoby considers the triumph of video-based culture as the primary source of America's mental decay. Yes, she admits that "screen media" has "many intellectually useful components," but also believes that "it is on balance an unfriendly habitat not only for serious high-level intellectual endeavour but also for the more ordinary exchanges of ideas that enliven and elevate culture at every level." The more people watch – or IM (instant message), or e-mail, or play video games – the less they read and converse.

Here, of course, the author is fighting a losing battle. But it is shocking that more than two-thirds of Americans, according to recent surveys, are unable to identify DNA as the key to heredity, or understand radiation and what it can do to the body. Most shocking of all is that one in five adults is convinced that the sun revolves around the earth.

There is no mention of Canada in the book, but there is no reason to believe that most of the findings for Americans would differ for Canadians.

The author who calls herself a "cultural conservationist" is understandably gloomy about the future. But take heart! I am sure that there is more than just a saving remnant that will preserve and further cultural values into tomorrow.

Israel's birth, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Poking through old documents isn't what most people generally imagine as an exciting hour or two on the Internet. But when those documents illustrate first-hand the arguments and events surrounding the establishment of the State of Israel, they take on a certain importance and currency.

The United Nations was barely a year old when the question of Palestine made its way onto its agenda. In May 1947, two hearings were granted, one for the Jewish Agency for Palestine and the other for the Arab Higher Committee. Because David Ben-Gurion, who led the struggle to establish the State of Israel, was not available to address the United Nations on the first day, Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver found himself on the world stage. Rabbi Silver was a well-known Zionist leader and rabbi of Cleveland's Temple Tifereth-Israel. You can read his speech online, as well as Ben-Gurion's and Moshe (Shertok) Sharrett's. Sharrett was to become the second prime minister of Israel. [tinyurl.com/5a3lb6] (Transcripts of the Arab presentations to the United Nations are not available online.)

Things, of course, heated up in the United Nations later that year with the passing of Resolution 181, calling for the partition of Palestine. [tinyurl.com/5bgs93] As well as reading the resolution, you can watch a short documentary that includes historic footage from the UN vote that began: "We will proceed the role call. Afghanistan? No. Argentina? Argentina? Abstention. Australia? Yes. Belgium? Yes…" [tinyurl.com/4j7alr] The final vote: 33 in favour, 13 against and 10 abstained.

Even if your eyes tend to glaze over when you look at historic documents, don't miss the two maps that form annexes to Resolution 181. The first illustrates proposed borders of Palestine. The Jewish state would include the northeast Galilee, the Mediterranean coast from Haifa to about Ashdod and much of the Negev. The Arab state area's include Acre and the northwest Galilee, a section extending from Jenin to Be'er Sheva and the Jordan River to Ramle, Gaza and a section of the Negev, as well as the enclave of Jaffa. [tinyurl.com/3o7jlu] At the heart of the region is Greater Jerusalem, which, including Bethlehem, would come under international control. [tinyurl.com/4a7uj2]

Of course that was not to be. On May 14, 1948, one day after the British Mandate for Palestine expired, Israel declared independence. You can read the declaration in the original Hebrew [tinyurl.com/5oz8xy] and in English. [tinyurl.com/6xka8s] As well, you can listen to Ben-Gurion as he addresses the Jewish People's Council in Tel Aviv. [tinyurl.com/474ozv]

The following day, the Arab League declared war. Their document sums up the history of the region, explains the illegitimacy of the Jewish state and proclaims that "the Governments of the Arab States have found themselves compelled to intervene in Palestine solely in order to help its inhabitants restore peace and security and the rule of justice and law to their country, and in order to prevent bloodshed." [tinyurl.com/6d8 dqm]

As the fighting continued – and after it stopped – the conflict in Israel continued to preoccupy the United Nations. In 1948, the UN Security Council passed 28 resolutions on everything from the admission of Burma to the world body to the control of atomic energy. But you can get a pretty good indication of where their energies were focused when you consider that 16 of those 28 resolutions dealt with "The Palestine Question." [tinyurl.com/3q27zg]

There is an extensive online collection of documents at the Harry S. It reads simply, "This Government has been informed that a Jewish state has been proclaimed in Palestine, and recognition has been requested by the provisional Government thereof. The United States recognizes the provisional government as the de facto authority of the new Jewish state. [signed] Harry Truman. Approved, May 14, 1948." [tinyurl.com/6hs9dv]

I found it particularly interesting when you can see how typed phrases like "Jewish state" had been stroked out on Truman's note and replaced by the hand-written words "State of Israel."

Imam speaks at interfaith dinner

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

Imam Hamid Slimi made history on May 14 as the first imam to speak at a Neighbourhood Interfaith Group dinner.

The 22nd annual dinner, which was hosted by Yorkminster Park Baptist Church, brought together members of the Jewish, Christian and Muslim communities for a night of food, drinks and conversation.

"It's good that [we] gathered together to break bread and listen to one another in the spirit of grace," said Rev. Peter Holmes of the Yorkminster Church. "Gatherings like this are a sign of hope and a beacon of light to this world."

Imam Slimi, who has been an imam for 11 years, is the founder of the Faith of Life Network; the imam of the International Muslims Organization of Toronto; and the chairman of the Canadian Council of Imams.

"We did extensive research," said Bryan Beauchamp, one of the organizers of the event and the chairman of the Interfaith Group. "We wanted a moderate, progressive, well-educated and well- spoken person. [Imam Slimi] is the ideal guy."

In his speech titled "The Golden Rule," Imam Slimi spoke about Islam and its beliefs.

"Islam is very simple. There's one God in heaven and God is merciful," he said. "There is this unfavourable thinking of Islam and Muslims. I can't deny that there are extreme thoughts – it happens in every religion."

During his speech, Imam Slimi, who was born in Morocco, addressed the misconception that all Muslims are taught to hate the Jewish community.

"Everyone is loved by God," he said. "I grew up in a district where we had Jews and Christians. We were never taught to hate [them.] The prophet said that [Muslims] can marry Jews and Christians, who are the people of the Book."

The imam was invited to speak at the dinner because of a comment made by Rabbi Erwin Schild four years ago. While addressing the gathering at the 18th annual interfaith group dinner, the rabbi said that the group's next challenge was to engage their Muslim neighbours.

During this year's dinner, Rabbi Schild spoke about the first murder documented in the Torah.

"It was one brother killing another," he said. "The murderer [thought], 'I can't be responsible for my brother.' In the course of time, we've learned that we are our brother's keeper – what we haven't learned yet is who is my brother. We are responsible for all religions."

This sense of responsibility led Beauchamp to become involved in the interfaith group, which was founded in 1986.

'This is my calling," he said, motioning around the room. "Our mission is to achieve respect and appreciation for the religious beliefs of others."

The group includes 14 churches and synagogues, and one private school in midtown Toronto. There are no mosques in the community that the group serves, but Beauchamp plans to continue inviting Muslim speakers.

"We'll have a three-year cycle," he said. "Next year, we'll have a Roman Catholic archbishop, and in 2010 we'll start the cycle again."

Beauchamp, who is an Anglican, tries to seat people of different religions at the same table to encourage a dialogue.

"We spread Muslim guests among the room. We try to put four Christians and four Jews at each table," he said.

Beauchamp says the key to uniting different religions is to concentrate on similarities rather than differences.

"Rather than sitting together and discussing whether Jesus will return to Earth we focus on 'love thy neighbour as yourself.'"

Through interfaith group events, Beauchamp hopes to remind the community of these similarities.

"Judeo-Christian traditions line up almost side by side. We respect Jewish belief – the more we can encourage this approach, the more we can stand up and speak about issues of peace."

In his closing speech, Rabbi Schild reminded guests that they had something in common.

"We're all citizens of Canada," he said. "In Canada, people with different ethnicities and religions can live together in harmony."

Former accountant moves to classroom

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sam Lipper's patient, low-key manner is evident within a few minutes when you visit his classroom at Beth Sholom Hebrew School.

Students in his twice-weekly special education class pepper him with questions and comments. One question – "How did the Jews get from Egypt to Europe?" – leads to an impromptu Jewish history lesson in the middle of a story on the wise men of Chelm.

"They are our teachers..."

Lipper's class is informal, with a handful of students seated around a rectangular table with him while Hebrew music plays in the background. His students call him by his first name, and he noted in an interview that he doesn't sit at the head of the table.

A native of Capetown, South Africa, who immigrated to Toronto 27 years ago with his then-wife and young son, Lipper, 69, worked as a chartered accountant for most of his adult life.

A lesson from the teacher: "Nothing is impossible. Everything is a matter of time. You have to be patient."

A chance sighting of a newspaper ad about 10 years ago, seeking volunteers to work with children with special needs, was his entrée into the education field.

Lipper accepted a volunteer position at Eglinton Public School, where he now works as a special needs assistant.

About four years ago, someone suggested his name when Beth Sholom was looking for a special education teacher.

Although he has taken courses through the Toronto District School Board, Lipper is not a teacher by training.

But Karen Goodis, principal of the Hebrew school, says the work his students do and the success they achieve in a part-time setting is "outstanding." She credits his calmness, and the fact that he's "consistent and persistent."

Accountants have to be precise and methodical, Lipper admits, but he also likes to bring his love for art, music and literature into the classroom. An amateur artist who used to do a lot of sketching, he is also a fan of Japanese animé (animation for films).

Lipper's knowledge of Hebrew was honed at five-day-a-week cheder when he was a child, then later at university and during a year in Israel in his 20s.

Sometimes he uses games to teach the language – for example throwing a ball while counting in Hebrew.

"We have fun together."

For students who have difficulty reading or writing, he believes that repetition is important, "but in an interesting way.

"It's incremental. You'll get them to write the aleph bet over and over again, [then] suddenly something will happen.

Funnily enough, Lipper said, he never thought of becoming a teacher when he was younger, although he tutored other students at university.

"When I grew up," he said, "you [became] a doctor, a lawyer or an accountant."

Now, he says, in a way, he regrets not having made a change sooner.

Feminists hope for more gains

'Female rabbis and cantors are old news'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Letty Cottin Pogrebin's mother died, of cancer in 1955, Pogrebin, who was 15 at the time, felt shut out of the mourners service.

"I was excluded from saying Kaddish for a parent. As a daughter, I was excluded by my own faith… As a woman, I was not counted in the minyan," she told some 120 people, most of them women, at a recent luncheon at Congregation Darchei Noam organized by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning at the Bathurst JCC.

Keynote speaker Pogrebin, an accomplished journalist, a social activist and an internationally known feminist, said that while Jewish feminists have made many gains, there is still significant gender inequity among the Orthodox.

She shared the dais with Sarah Fulford, the new editor of Toronto Life magazine. The women spoke about the challenges and changes in the women's movement, viewed from their respective generational vantage points.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel, moderated the discussion. She noted that both guest speakers had achieved important feminist milestones. Fulford is both the first Jewish and the first female editor of Toronto Life, while Pogrebin, is the founding editor of Ms. Magazine.

There was also a surprise celebration to mark Rabbi Goldstein's having received an honorary doctorate in divinity from Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion and her 25th anniversary in the rabbinate. It was noted that like the guest speakers, she, too, had set a feminist milestone as one of the first female rabbis in Canada.

The discussion contrasted generational differences in feminism. The thirtysomething Fulford said women her age don't focus on gender equality issues because social changes such as extended maternity leave and the greater involvement of men in the care of children have given them "incredible freedom" to be mothers and realize their career aspirations.

Letty Cottin Pogrebin

She said her own mother, a radio producer for 20 years, and other women of that generation were torn between their careers and domestic responsibilities. Many of them led double lives, hiding the fact that they were mothers from their colleagues. "They didn't keep pictures of their children on their desks."

Pogrebin, who represents that older generation, lamented the fact that today there are too many individuals and a lack of "collective solidarity" among women on feminist issues.

She said she has seen many advances in Judaic practice, noting that women have made great strides in Jewish scholarship – in Talmud and Torah study – and she doesn't foresee women losing the right to have aliyot.

She also pointed to other gains: "Female rabbis and cantors are old news. Women are becoming scribes, and we even have female mohels."

She contrasted these gains with the traditional role of women when she was a child. "My father reclined on Passover. The women cooked and served. They stood there silently. They couldn't say Kiddush. They couldn't ask the Four Questions or say the Ten Plagues."

Turning to another issue, Pogrebin said there is more readiness on the part of rabbis to speak out against domestic violence, although she noted that they are slower to acknowledge the problem within the Orthodox community.

She stressed that Jews are no different from other groups. "People say, 'Jews don't do that.' [But] we have these problems like every community group."

She called on the community to punish men who refuse to grant their wives a get, a Jewish religious divorce. "These women are chained to their husbands. We have to care for these chained women. They're being blackmailed by their husbands… We have to find out who these women are and help them."

She said recalcitrant husbands should be ostracized by their own communities.

Pogrebin also urged women to give more to charity. "We need to "de-genderize" philanthropy. Be more generous. You don't need your husband's permission to give."

UJA Walk draws over 15,000

By DAVE GORDON
Special to the CJN

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Walk With Israel raised more than $500,000 and included more than 15,000 participants, organizers said.

The 7½-kilometre walk led from Coronation Park on the waterfront north through downtown and back to the Direct Energy Centre at Exhibition Place. The RioCan Carnival, with amusement park rides, a petting zoo and crafts, capped off the Sunday event.

Proceeds from the 2008 walk will go to programs for children and youth in Israel, with a specific focus on those in Sderot and the western Negev. They include trauma services, a program to reinforce roofs on some public buildings, and educational or social welfare services for youth at risk.

Joe Shedlitsky, 88, who has seen Israel go from humble beginnings to modern successes, said he was proud to have played a part. He fought alongside Ariel Sharon as infantry in Falluja, near Gaza, in 1948 during Israel's War of Independence. He has been living in Canada since 1952.

"My emotions could not be higher today. Every day we should be happy to have come this far with the Jewish people in Canada and in Israel," he said, adding that he has participated in every local walk since the first one 38 years ago.

Walker Carl Thorpe, a Christian man originally from Jamaica, said his support for Israel has strong roots in his family of nine siblings.

"Much of the component of my support is through my faith," Thorpe said. "It's impossible to be Christian and not support the Jewish state."

Hillel to build new $7-million home at UBC

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — When demolition crews start tearing down Hillel House at the University of British Columbia next month, an institution that has been central to Jewish life on campus since 1947 will begin a new chapter.

The razing of the 61-year-old building will pave the way for the construction of a new, $7-million Hillel House on the old structure's current site in the heart of UBC's campus. It's scheduled to open in August 2009.

"We're going from 2,500 square feet to 12,000 square feet in a space that will offer student offices, a games room, a large student lounge, a dining hall, a kosher kitchen, a boardroom and a library," said Eyal Lichtmann, executive director of Vancouver Hillel.

Proposed new Hillel House at UBC

The new building is being designed by Acton Ostry Architects, an award-winning firm whose portfolio includes Vancouver's new King David Jewish High School and West Vancouver's Har-El Synagogue.

The project has been made possible in part by UBC's agreement to extend Hillel's lease in its current location until 2084.

"We consider it a multi-million dollar investment by the university in providing us with the opportunity to be here for the next 76 years," Lichtmann said.

"It's quite historic, and it's a big deal, because this is a gift to the Jewish community: to be able to be on the centre of campus with the best location of a Hillel on any campus in North America. All they're asking our community to do is put up the money for the building."

Vancouver Hillel wasn't always in the campus centre. When the current building first opened its doors in 1947, it was located on the outskirts of the university. But a new academic corridor was built around Hillel House in the 1960s, giving it an enviable location.

When Lichtmann and his team became aware of UBC's plans to redevelop the campus back in 2004, they opted to work with the administration to find a way to stay on campus.

"We made the argument that we've been here since 1947, and just because we're in the centre of student life now, we shouldn't be moved," he said. "The university agreed."

Vancouverite Isaac Thau is heading the capital fundraising campaign for Vancouver Hillel and has helped raise $6.5 million over the past 18 months. "Our funding so far has come from almost exclusively within Vancouver," Thau said. "We're hoping to raise $8 million to have a larger endowment for Hillel."

Thau, a Winnipeg native who moved to British Columbia 25 years ago, became involved with Hillel in 1998.

"I was sitting around many communal board tables at the time and found that so much of the dialogue was on how to stem the tide of assimilation and keep people Jewish," he recalls. "Then Birthright [Israel] started and we saw a phenomenal success, kids returning from Israel inspired, with an amber light burning inside them. Hillel figured out how to take these kids, with their Jewish pride and love for Israel, and offer them a place to grow those emerging feelings and awareness."

The Hillel House on UBC's campus also serves as a nerve centre for Hillel at the University of Victoria and Simon Fraser University across town, and future plans see it serving B.C.'s community college system as well.

The new building will enrich both Jewish life and Jewish student life on campus, Lichtmann said.

"We're building something that's going to create an enormous amount of Jewish student engagement and integrate Jewish students into Jewish life for the next 80 years," he explains. "This will help build our community."

PRAISE FOR TILTED: TRIAL OF CONRAD BLACK

"For a reader with a general interest in the trial and the doings of the Hollinger Four, Skurka affords some fresh perspectives and original reporting."
— Globe and Mail

"... an insightful play-by-play account of one of the most notorious corporate trials of the past few decades ... Skurka ... writes with an accessible style that blends legal expertise with insightful anecdotes that serve to illustrate to the Canadian reader what made this courtroom experience so overwhelming to Black's lead defence lawyer Eddie Greenspan."
— Quill and Quire

"... provide(s) readers with insights from a legalistic point of view without the legalese ... While Black is a fascinating character covering fraud trials can be deadly dull, so kudos to Skurka for being able to breathe some life into his book."
— The Leader Post

"Steven Skurka is in a unique position to best describe not just what happened during the Conrad Black trial, but also why it happened. No one else will be able to offer as insightful a perspective into the legal issues, decisions, and strategies that shaped the trial."
— Eddie Greenspan, lawyer for Conrad Black

"Skurka deftly weaves unique personal and professional experiences into the fabric of the complex and acutely human trial of Conrad Black and his three co-defendants. The straightforward prose free of legalese and light doses of humour throughout will appeal to the layperson and legal professional alike. The major and minor players in the Conrad Black trial may not appreciate such forthrightness, but to this juror in the case, this is an independent look at what occurred in full public view, flavoured by the many whispered asides of insiders seated in the gallery, riding the elevators, and yes, pleading their cases in the Dirksen Courthouse."
— James Kirby, juror

"This book is an original blending of legal analysis, humour, and a daily chronicle of a fascinating trial and all its characters. A fun and informative read that I really enjoyed."
— Marie Henein, noted attorney, Henein & Associates

Quebec should fight anti-Semitism: report

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec government should take "exceptional measures" to combat anti-Semitism, say the authors of the final report of the commission on reasonable accommodation, which acknowledges a disturbing increase in anti-Semitic incidents.

The commission co-chairs, eminent academics Gérard Bouchard and Charles Taylor, also urge all Quebecers to gain a more accurate picture of their fellow Jewish citizens.

"It is in Quebec society's interests to get to know the Jewish community better," the report states, noting that more than 80 per cent of Jews under 35 speak French; that "the vast majority [of Jews] adhere to Quebecers' shared values," and that the community is diverse, with only 12 per cent being Chassidim.

However, the authors reject as "gratuitous" any accusation that the commission, especially during public hearings last fall, contributed to prejudice against Jews. They also provide evidence that the process may actually have calmed down the "turmoil" that occurred between March 2006 and June 2007, when a public debate raged in Quebec over certain practices of religious minorities.

The authors recognize that anti-Semitic remarks were made during the 26 forums held around the province, and that the Jewish community was "unfairly accused" of making the public subsidize the cost of kosher certification, but they said the comments represented only a dozen of the close to 1,000 presentations.

Bouchard and Taylor add that they condemned these comments when they were made. Moreover, they say that most of the objectionable comments about Jews "echoed" high-profile media reports, such as ones about conflicts involving Chassidim in Montreal's Outremont neighbourhood or in the Laurentians, in addition to the kashrut controversy.

The report states that, in fact, Muslims, especially those of Arab origin, face the most discrimination in Quebec, and it also stresses the need to fight "Islamophobia."

While speaking of the urgent need to fight discrimination, the co-chairs said at a press conference that they don't believe Quebecers of French-Canadian descent are any more racist than any other people, despite recent polls indicating otherwise.

The commission was established by Quebec Premier Jean Charest in February 2007, and in addition to public consultations, involved 13 academic research projects and 31 focus groups.

Its 300-page report, Building the Future: A Time for Reconciliation, was released last Thursday after 14 months of consultation and research. It cost $3.7 million. To underline state neutrality, the report urges that government employees who "embody the state" – judges, Crown prosecutors, police officers, prison guards and the president and vice-president of the national assembly – be prohibited from wearing religious symbols, such as kippot.

Other employees, such as teachers, public servants, and health-care workers, should be exempt from that directive. Students should also be allowed to wear religious items in school.

Bouchard and Taylor are against a general ban because it would prevent certain religious adherents from working in the public service, and because it would contravene basic rights and "largely complicate the task of building a public service that reflects Quebec's population."

The report also calls for the removal of the crucifix from Quebec's national assembly – which Charest quickly rejected – and the elimination of prayer at municipal council meetings. However, the commission has no problem with cities allowing the installation of an eruv, as long as it does not inconvenience other people.

Generally, the co-chairs conclude there is no crisis in Quebec over accommodating religious and cultural minorities, that public institutions are handling accommodation requests well, and that Quebec's value of secularism is not threatened. But they say misperception is dividing Quebecers.

The commission investigated 21 of the many media stories over the past couple of years that portrayed demands for accommodation as being excessive. It found that 15 contained "striking distortions" or incomplete information that negatively affected public views of the situation.

Among the stories was one that said the management of province's auto insurance body had ordered female driving examiners to let their male colleagues test Orthodox Jewish men, and, most egregiously, one that said kashrut supervision costs Quebec consumers and companies millions.

The report states that, while "no authoritative comprehensive study currently exists on the topic," the evidence is that additional costs are "very minimal" and that rabbis don't profit from kashrut certification. They suggest that an independent study be done to put to rest this stereotype.

The co-chairs also strongly support the compulsory course on comparative religion and ethics to be introduced in all Quebec schools this fall, about which Orthodox officials have serious concerns.

Canadian Jewish Congress said it disagrees with the commission's recommendation that judges, Crown prosecutors and police officers should not be permitted to wear religious symbols. Victor Goldbloom, Congress' Quebec region president, said such attire is a matter of religious freedom and a ban would effectively bar, for example, an Orthodox Jew from being a judge. Overall, however, Goldbloom said he found the report "positive and balanced."

B'nai Brith Canada, which did draw a direct parallel between the commission's activities and a rise in anti-Semitism, said the report offers an "overly simplistic and naïve prescription" for overcoming problems through dialogue and exchange.

But the report was genuinely welcomed by Alex Werzberger, head of the Coalition of Chassidic Organizations of Outremont.

"It's definitely going to improve the atmosphere, especially because it is coming from two really respected people," he said.

'Grow Winnipeg' launches teen program

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Brian Scharfstein remembers what it was like growing up in Winnipeg's Jewish community in the 1950s and '60s.

"Back then, there were always activities for kids and teens at the Jewish centre [the old YMHA]," he recalled. "There was floor hockey. There were clubs. There was always something going on."

Scharfstein, chairman of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's "Grow Winnipeg" initiative – which aims to stabilize and increase the city's Jewish population – hopes that a new community program to train teen leaders that's just getting underway will give the current younger generation similar memories of growing up in Manitoba's capital.

"Our new Machon Madrichim program may well be the most important initiative we have seen in our community in many years," Scharfstein said. "One of our mandates at Grow Winnipeg is recruitment and retention. Machon Madrichim may be the bridge that connects all of our other retention programs."

Added Machon Madrichim steering committee member Sergio Vulej: "One of the things we were hearing in the community was of the need for more activities that would appeal to teens, activities that would be fun."

Machon Madrichim is modelled on the federation's successful four-year-old Club Fed, which takes younger adults through a year-long course intended to familiarize them with all aspects of the community.

Interim Machon Madrichim director Hart Jacob said the program is a two-year Jewish leadership development course for grade 10 and 11 students aimed at training them to develop and lead youth activities and connect more strongly with the community.

The program will focus on Jewish traditions and holidays, group dynamics, leadership and planning techniques, community and social involvement, and also involve hands-on activities. As well, there will be workshops on Israeli dancing and songs, wilderness activities, arts and crafts, drama, camping and first aid.

The program will rotate among different Jewish institutions in the city, and will involve one three-hour class a week and a monthly weekend activity.

At the end of the two-year program, the participants will be qualified to be camp counsellors and youth group leaders.

"The [Jewish] camps have done a good job of fostering youth leadership," said Jacob, who was the program director at Camp Massad for the past three years. "But they only operate in the summers. A year-round program such as Machon Madrichim will turn out leaders who are more well-rounded."

Scharfstein said that what he really likes about the new program is that it's aimed at young people who don't spend a lot of time at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, Winnipeg's main Jewish centre.

"The majority of Jewish high school students aren't at the campus," he said.

Jacob said he has just started marketing the program to Jewish high school students in the city. "We expect to be starting the classes in September," he added.

JEWISH LAWYERS RECALLED: The Okanagan Jewish community hosted an opening reception for the Lawyers Without Rights exhibit on May 14, in Kelowna, B.C., with approximately 60 people in attendance. Kelowna was the 51st city in the world to receive the exhibit, which was developed by the German Federal Bar Association to chronicle the lives of some of the 5,000 German Jewish lawyers and judges who were removed by the Nazis in 1933. Sid Segal, past president of the Okanagan Jewish Community Centre, addressed the audience, welcoming Leo Adler, right, of the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies; Barbara Buchanan, centre, of the Law Society of B.C., and Stephan Gocken, left, general director of the German Federal Bar Association, who came from Germany for the event. The exhibit ran until May 24.

Canadian Jewish studies group meets in B.C.

The program for this year's Association for Canadian Jewish Studies conference, being held June 1 to 3 in Vancouver, reflects a shift – or perhaps more accurately, an expansion – in the association's focus in recent years.

Randal Schnoor, ACJS president since 2005 and a member since 1996, said in a telephone interview that he's noticed a large focus this year on literature, visual arts and music, which together constitute about half the program.

"I think that's demonstrating a healthy broadening of the Jewish studies field," he said.

The conference begins with a day-long Sunday session, which is open to the public, at Vancouver's Jewish Community Centre.

Schnoor said that it's the most "elaborate" local program in years. It will culminate in an evening reception with Jewish authors who have written about Western Canada.

The evening will include the association's annual award ceremony honoring this year's recipient, Vancouver resident Seymour Levitan, an editor and translator, for his contributions to the teaching of Yiddish and Yiddish culture in Vancouver.

Arts-related sessions on the Sunday include "Canadian Jewish Music" with Messod Salama of Memorial University of Newfoundland and Moshe Denburg of the Vancouver Inter-Cultural Orchestra, and, in the evening, "Jewish Authors of Western Canada" with Nancy Richler, Norman Ravvin and Joe Rosenblatt.

At the rest of the conference, being held at the University of British Columbia, arts-related sessions include "Canadian Klezmer: A Representation of a Double Diaspora" with Mike Anklewicz of York University; and "The Narrative of Visual Arts," which will feature speaker Barbara Weiser of Concordia University on "Synagogue Art in British Columbia" and Toronto librarian Phil Gold on "The Life of Joe Shuster and the Canadian Connection to Superman."

Also, on June 2, Toronto filmmakers Leonard Pearl and Richard Gagné will discuss the progress of a film they are making on Jewish Canadians.

Reflecting a newer subject of academic interest, at a session titled "Notions of Identity," Donna Goodman of Concordia University will discuss "Reflections of the Canadian Diaspora Through the Window of Cookbooks."

Schnoor says the association, which has about 150 members, is now "much more open" to looking at popular culture. "I think the more ways we can explore Jewish life in Canada, the more interesting it is."

The conference is held annually in conjunction with other conferences as part of the nine-day Congress of the Humanities and Social Sciences, "a Canadian body of learned societies," said Schnoor.

Sometimes there are joint sessions with other societies – such as one with the Canadian Society of Medievalists – "which enriches the quality of what we're doing," he said.

Also, Schnoor added, it provides an opportunity for scholars to attend sessions at the other conferences.

Although the locale of the ACJS conference is dictated by the larger group, "part of our tradition is to combine with the local community, with one day out of three where we hold our events at the community centre or the local synagogue," said Schnoor.

Regarding his own involvement with the association, Schnoor said he thinks that it's "important to promote research on Canadian Jewish life… and I enjoy doing it."

A sociologist specializing in contemporary Jewish life in Canada and the United States, Schnoor said his field, which dates back to an increased interest in ethnic groups in the 1960s, is a less-traditional area of Jewish studies than Bible, Jewish history and Hebrew language research. "In the last few decades, the field has broadened out."

Bill protecting community institutions passes second reading

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A federal bill that would make it a specific criminal offence to commit hate-motivated mischief against an educational or other institution used by an identifiable group passed second reading in Parliament with support from all parties. It has been referred to the standing committee on justice and human rights for further study.

Bloc Québécois MP Carole Freeman tabled Bill C-384, which amends Section 430 of the Criminal Code by adding a clause related to damage to a building or property, such as schools, community centres and recreational facilities used exclusively or principally by a particular religious, ethnic or racial group, or group defined by its sexual orientation.

The amendment would also allow for tougher penalties.

Currently, only religious institutions and cemeteries are specifically cited in the code for special protection. Hate motivation can be considered an aggravating factor in sentencing in such crimes.

Alberta Conservative MP Blaine Calkins, a justice committee member, said in the House of Commons that two purposes would be served by enacting the bill.

"First, the creation of a specific offence will draw attention to the actions that the offence prohibits. It will state clearly that the violent expression of hatred against a minority group is a criminal offence, with all of the consequences for those who are found guilty.

"Second, the bill will increase the penalty for the offence. We know that in most cases, mischief is prosecuted by way of summary conviction. Under the current law, a person convicted of mischief against one of the buildings listed in Bill C-384, for example, when prosecuted by summary conviction is currently only subject to a maximum penalty of six months. Bill C-384 would increase this penalty up to 18 months."

Under the current law, if the Crown wants to request a penalty of more than six months, it must proceed by way of indictment. The bill would allow the Crown to request a penalty of up to 18 months without having to resort to the more complex procedure of indictment, he said.

The bill would also have a practical effect when the offence is prosecuted by indictment.

The current law provides for a higher maximum sentence when the value of the property against which the mischief is committed is more than $5,000. Currently, when the value of the property is $5,000 or less, the maximum penalty is only two years. It is 10 years when the value of the property is more than $5,000.

The bill would eliminate the distinction based on the value of the property.

"Hate crimes know no value of property. The higher maximum of 10 years would apply regardless of the value of the property against which the mischief is committed. As a result, the maximum penalty would be increased from two years to 10 years for mischief against property of $5,000 or less," Calkins said.

He believes, however, that the bill would benefit from some technical improvements.

"I think it would be beneficial to clarify the language of the bill and ensure that it is consistent with the provisions currently set out in the Criminal Code."

Toronto area Liberal MP Borys Wrzesnewskyj also spoke in support of the bill, but he suggested that the list of identifiable groups be broadened to include gender. Montreal Liberal MP Marlene Jennings wants the list also to include official-language minorities.

Baker urges support for students on campus

Baker was hopeful the recently reconstituted Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce would boost trade between the countries.

If so, it will have to overcome some negative reporting by Canada's media, he said.

Correspondents in Israel inject negative elements into positive stories, and "I spend a lot of time trying to correct reports from Canadian correspondents in Israel to put things in a more proportional way," he added.

Baker issued a warning to the Jewish community to focus its resources on supporting students on campus, who he said are "on the front lines" of anti-Israel agitation. "There's a well-oiled, well-financed campaign" to vilify Israel, he added.

'There's a well-oiled, well-financed campaign' to vilify Israel

Another source of concern was hostility by organized labour toward the Jewish state, as demonstrated by anti-Israel resolutions adopted by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) and CUPE Ontario.

Ironically, at the same time, Baker said his relationship with Arab and Muslim ambassadors posted in Ottawa seems to have improved.

Envoys from Jordan, Egypt and Albania attended the embassy's Independence Day party, and he has developed good relationships with ambassadors representing countries that don't even have diplomatic relationships with Israel.

Of course, the Syrian, Lebanese and Iranian ambassadors will have nothing to do with him, but Baker said he's on good terms with colleagues from Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Yemen.

As Baker winds up his four-year tour of duty in Ottawa, he's happy he's been able to tour Canada and meet people from some of its smaller communities.

"It's been a huge privilege and honour to represent Israel in a country like Canada," he said.

CIC condemns book burning in Israel

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Committee says it deplores last week's burning of hundreds of copies of the New Testament in Or Yehuda, Israel, as a violation of fundamental Jewish principles and values.

"As the victims of book-burnings over so many centuries, the Jewish people – more than any group in the world – must reject the intolerance implicit in such a repulsive act," said CIC National chairman Moshe Ronen.

"It is essential that we ensure respect for the sacred texts of other faith communities and protect the principle of religious freedom in Israel.

"It is incumbent on Israeli and Jewish leadership to denounce this act, for dishonouring one set of religious beliefs dishonours all, and it is a very slippery slope from book burning to more violent forms of intolerance and extremism," Ronen added.

Moshe Ronen

Last week, a group of yeshiva students in Or Yehuda burned copies of the New Testament and pamphlets urging Jews to convert to Christianity that had been distributed surreptitiously by missionaries in the predominantly observant town of 34,000 near Tel Aviv.

Or Yehuda Deputy Mayor Uzi Aharon condemned the burning of the books, but not of the conversion pamphlets.

Some 10,000 members of Jews for Jesus are estimated to be in Israel.

Israeli authorities and most Jews frown on missionary activity, although in most cases, it's not illegal.

Fraternity seeks volunteer dentists

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Alpha Omega Fraternity's Toronto alumni chapter is seeking dentists who will go the extra mile.

The dental fraternity is looking for volunteers for its program that provides pro bono services such as fillings, cleaning, some surgical procedures and dentures for clients of Jewish Family & Child who are on social assistance, such as Ontario Works or long-term disability.

Daniel Pollit, an orthodontist who runs the volunteer program, said that up until 15 years ago, volunteers used to work out of Baycrest, but now dentists work out of their own offices, using their own tools and materials.

Eric Kirsh, supervisor of financial assistance and rehabilitation at JF & C, said social assistance offers some basic dental care, but not all dentists will accept referrals.

"Our goal is to connect our clients with dentists in the Alpha Omega program who will perform services that go beyond those covered by Ontario Works.

Kids under 18 and the elderly have access to dentists through public health, he said, but the fraternity serves those in between.

"These are people who have no funds," Kirsh said.

He said that he sees clients who haven't received dental care for a good part of their lives. "Most of us take dental care for granted, but these clients don't see dentists at all. It is the last thing they think about, until they are in pain."

When the mouth isn't healthy, he said, it can affect a person's overall health.

Pollit said his group tries to connect JF&C clients to dentists in a convenient location for them, and if money is tight, it offers gas or taxi money. "We want to make it as easy as possible for them to get to the dentist."

He said the fraternity gets donations, but the bulk of the money goes toward service that require a laboratory fee, such as dentures. "The dentists volunteer their time, and any costs are covered by the fraternity."

Ian Braverman, fraternity president, said that with about 700 members, they are one of the largest chapters in the world.

"We solicit volunteers once a year, and the number of volunteers varies from 60 to 90. The program is easier to run if we have more dentists available. We like to have a few dentists in reserve in case of emergency."

Kirsh said he gets a lot of positive feedback from his clients. "The dentists don't stigmatize them, and the patient's confidentiality is protected. The volunteers need to be commended."

Dentists who want to volunteer can call Pollit at 416-491-1337.

Reena honours Compers at annual dinner

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Reena Foundation's 2008 tribute dinner honouring Tony and Elizabeth Comper is set for June 2 at the Sheraton Centre.

Gary Sim, foundation president, said they are honouring the Compers because of their immense contribution to both the Jewish and the general community.

"Their work has [helped] make the world a more accepting, tolerant [place.]"

In 2005, the Compers founded FAST (Fighting Anti-Semitism Together), a coalition of non-Jewish Canadian business and community leaders who have vowed to speak out against anti-Semitism, after the number of anti-Semitic incidents reached a record high in Canada.

FAST's two objectives are to encourage prominent non-Jews to publicly denounce anti-Semitism – both headline-making incidents and remarks that may come up in everyday conversation – and to encourage schools to use its educational package, intended for grades 6 to 9.

Tony and Elizabeth Comper

In other community involvements, Elizabeth worked on the board of the Tarragon Theatre, helped raise money to fund the first Yee Hong Centre for Geriatric Care, a non-profit centre with special sensitivity to Chinese and South Asian cultures, and is active with the Canadian Council for Diversity.

While Tony was a chief executive at the BMO Financial Group, he set up a task force to discover why so few women were bank executives, resulting in an increase to 34 per cent from nine per cent in these positions.

He also launched initiatives to support the hiring of visible minorities, aboriginals and people with disabilities.

Sim said the annual dinner honours people who have made an impact on the community. "They were very open to the idea of being honoured by us, and told us that they are struck by the profound work we do. They told us we 'do God's work.'"

גידי קורן וחברים

שני סרטים שכדאי

שני סרטים חדשים שכל יהודי ולבטח ישראלי-מן הראוי שיראה.

Fugitive Pieces מבוסס על ספרה רב המכר של אן מייקלס הטורונטאית. זהו ספורו של איש צעיר שניצל מן השואה בזמן שמשפחתו נשלחה למחנות ביזכות ארכיאולוג יווני שחפר באזור מגוריו והבריח אותו ליוון. מקץ שנים של מגורים באי יווני מהגר הארכיאולוג לקנדה ופה מתבגר ומבשיל הנער, שזוכר רק רסיסים ממה שאירע לו בילדותו, אך הרסיסים חוזרים בהבזקים וצובעים את חייו. זהו סרט מרגש ביותר, ואת מקומה של אהובת הנגור ממלאת בצורה נהדרת השחקנית הישראלית אילת זוהר שמביאה אישיות חמה וחזקה למסך. למרות שהסרט יכול להיות מקוטלג כעוד סרט שואה-יש בו אנרגיות שהפעימו אותי-איך להצמיח אנרגיה חיובית בְּמקומות הכי אימים בחיים.

"ארץ גדולה מנהיגים קטנים"

תגדה לאחרי ההבי ששלח לי את הקטע שכתבה יעל דיין לכבוד שישים שנה למדינה. מפאת קוצר היריעה אביא רק קטעים נבחרים:

"אני לפחות לא מצליחה להבין איך באותה מדינה-
הנשיא חשוד באונס, שר אוצר חשוד בגניבה,
שר משפטים מרצה עונש על לשון שברחה ממקומה,
וראש ממשלה מדלג מחקירה לחקירה-
...איך במדינה שלרגעים נדמה כאילו כולה ותת אוהדה,
המשקיעים ממשיכים לשים כסף, והברדסה יוצאת מגדרה...
ותנחלת החיים הממוצעת נשקת לשמנים,
כן או טו טו כולנו שמעון פרס, חברות וחבריס!
או משהו לא מסתדר משני צידי המשוואה,
איך הפקרות חולקת חדר עם ההצלחה?
איך זה שהשחיתות לא מגרשת מכאן את הפריחה?
יכול להיות ששיגינו את כללי המשחק ותוקי המשיכה?
...כי זה ההסבר היחיד, חבריס, זה הפתרון שלי לכתב החידה:
זאת כבראה דוגמה נדירה בהסטוריה, ואולי אחת ויחידה
של אומה שבניה ובנותיה-טובים יותר מן העומדים בראשה..."
אבל ששאר בינינו.

Israel can't keep all of '67 lands, Olmert says

Netanyahu opposed to ceding Golan Heights

By SHAHAR ILAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Monday that only people suffering from hallucinations believe it's possible to hold all the territory that Israel captured in the 1967 Six Day War.

Olmert's comments came amid negotiations with the Palestinian Authority and indirect peace talks with Syria that resumed last week after an eight-year hiatus. They are being conducted indirectly, through Turkish mediation.

Palestinian officials said the negotiations over reaching a final status deal involved an Israeli offer of 91.5 per cent of the West Bank. Olmert made his remarks at a Knesset foreign affairs committee meeting.

In response, Likud MK Limor Livnat charged that what's hallucinatory is that a prime minister at the end of his political career can receive envelopes of cash and hold talks on the return of the Golan Heights to Syria.

The former cabinet minister was referring to the ongoing corruption investigation against Olmert, who is suspected of receiving illicit funds from a U.S. businessman over a number of years.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert

Later on in the committee session, Olmert denied holding talks with Hamas, despite Deputy Prime Minister Haim Ramon's claim of the opposite last week.

Olmert also said that the notion of Israel becoming a state "of all its citizens" is gaining credence within elites in the United States. He was speaking of what would be, in effect, a one-state solution whereby Palestinians would receive Israeli citizenship.

"This is a very dangerous process that endangers the continuation of our existence as a Jewish state," Olmert told the committee. He warned that if Israel doesn't reach an agreement with the Palestinian Authority, it will eventually face a Hamas leadership in the West Bank, as opposed to the current, more moderate Fatah faction.

In reference to talks with Damascus, Olmert said he has made no promises or commitments to Syria about a future peace deal. But he said it's clear what Syria wants as part of any deal.

On Sunday, Opposition leader and Likud chairman Benjamin Netanyahu issued another condemnation of the renewed peace talks between Israel and Syria, blasting the notion of a withdrawal from the Golan Heights, Israel Radio reported.

"We must not leave the Golan Heights because of its strategic height. We must not make peace with a dictatorial regime, because this will be a peace that we will not be able to protect," Netanyahu said at a meeting held by the Middle East Media Research Institute.

Last Thursday, Netanyahu warned that a withdrawal from the Golan would put Israel on Iran's front lines.

Opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu

Earlier Sunday, Olmert told his cabinet that the talks with Syria would be conducted with "the due responsibility and care," adding that "we must be careful not to let the fervour [over talks] affect our ability to reach significant results."

Also at Sunday's cabinet meaning, Olmert touted the method of covert talks, saying it allows for more successful negotiations. He cited past periods of talks with Syria as an example, pointing out that then, too, details were kept mostly under wraps.

"We will form a steering committee comprising all the relevant officials, and the government will be updated accordingly," he said.

Meanwhile, a Turkish official close to the talks said Sunday that Israel has expressed interest in holding direct negotiation with Syria, while Damascus prefers to maintain contact through Ankara, Army Radio reported.

Conversion head fired

The head of the State Conversion Authority, Rabbi Haim Druckman, was fired by the Prime Minister's Office last week. The refusal to renew Rabbi Druckman's contract which expires at the end of June, took people by surprise and sparked a flurry of speculation regarding the motive. The Prime Minister's Office said the rabbi's age, 75, was the reason for his dismissal. Rabbi Druckman was hired in 2004. He criticized the Prime Minister's Office. "Doing this now is foolish and malicious," he told Army Radio. "And the way it was done was disrespectful as well. No one talked to me. I just got a letter delivered to me by a messenger." Many observers believe the Prime Minister's Office was bowing to haredi political pressure to oust him from his position. A controversy developed recently when the rabbinate annulled all the divorce decrees issued by the Conversion Institute, only to have the annulment set aside by the chief Sephardi rabbi. The Conversion Institute remains the subject of attack by the haredi establishment.

Terror attack foiled

Israeli soldiers foiled a major Palestinian bomb attack on a key Gaza Strip border crossing. A Palestinian recruited by Islamic Jihad and Fatah terrorists drove an explosives-laden truck toward the Erez border crossing last Thursday, but was shot at by troops before he could enter the compound. The resulting explosion was heard for miles around, but killed only the driver. An Israeli helicopter attacked a vehicle carrying two of the terrorist's comrades away from the scene, but they escaped. The attack came as Egypt tries to broker a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas in Gaza. Ismail Haniyeh, the head of the Hamas administration in Gaza, said he was still studying the proposal.

Israel gives to China relief

The Israeli government is donating $1.5 million worth of equipment for earthquake relief in China. The first three tons of supplies arrived last week on a commercial El Al flight to Beijing. The supplies included sleeping bags, blankets and personal water purification units. A cargo plane carrying the remaining equipment, estimated between 70 and 90 tons, was to go directly to Chengdu. The Israeli government is making purchases based on a list of needed supplies from the Chinese government. "As longstanding friends of the Chinese people, we are committed to doing everything we can to help at this critical time," Israel's ambassador to China, Amos Nadai, said Thursday.

Ethiopians not well handled

A state audit faulted Israel's handling of recent Ethiopian immigrants. The annual state controller's report said 65 per cent of Ethiopian Jews who recently moved to Israel require the assistance of welfare agencies, but the state has not provided the personnel and facilities to cope properly with the demand. Some 25 per cent of Ethiopian immigrant youths use drugs and 75 per cent consume alcohol, the report said. Difficulties in assimilating recent Ethiopian arrivals have been highlighted in recent reports on schools that set up separate classes for the immigrants, citing "cultural differences." —JTA

Radical prof denied entry, sent back to Amsterdam

© Ha'aretz daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Shin Bet security service detained and deported an American Jewish professor who is a prominent critic of the Israeli occupation when he landed at Ben-Gurion International Airport on Friday.

Norman Finkelstein was interrogated for several hours and held in an airport cell before being put on a plane back to Amsterdam, his point of departure. Finkelstein said he was told he could not return to Israel for 10 years.

The Shin Bet said Finkelstein "is not permitted to enter Israel because of suspicions involving hostile elements in Lebanon," and because he "did not give a full accounting to interrogators with regard to these suspicions."

In e-mail and phone interviews with Ha'aretz after leaving Israel for Amsterdam, Finkelstein said, "I did my best to provide absolutely candid and comprehensive answers to all the questions put to me. I am confident that I have nothing to hide. Apart from my political views, and the supporting scholarship, there isn't much more to say for myself: alas, no suicide missions or secret rendezvous with terrorist organizations. I've always supported a two-state solution based on the 1967 borders. I'm not an enemy of Israel."

He said in the interview that he was "en route to Palestine to see one of my oldest and dearest friends, Musa Abu-Hashhash."

Finkelstein visited Lebanon a few months ago and met with Hezbollah operatives there, and subsequently published articles. He has accused Israel of exploiting the Holocaust for political ends.

Finkelstein said he was asked whether he had met with Al Qaeda operatives, whether he had been sent to Israel by Hezbollah and how he intended to finance his stay in Israel.

"I was kept in a holding cell at the airport for approximately 24 hours. It wasn't a Belgian bed-and-breakfast, but it wasn't Auschwitz either. I had several unpleasant moments with the guards at the airport and in the holding cell, but since martyrdom is not my cup of tea, I'll spare you the details," Finkelstein said.

Brussels' shul 'Great Synagogue of Europe'

JTA

BRUSSELS — Europe is about to get its own main synagogue without a single stone being lifted.

The Brussels main synagogue, La Regence, is to be rededicated as the Great Synagogue of Europe in a traditional ceremony led by Brussels Chief Rabbi Albert Guigui on June 4. Hosting the event will be the Conference of European Rabbis, which represents Orthodox rabbis in more than 40 countries.

Jose Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, and Sir Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth of United Kingdom, will address guests from the international rabbinic community, the Brussels diplomatic corps and the local community.

The president of the Brussels Jewish Community, Raymond Cahen, will join Barroso in signing the inaugural document.

La Grande Synagogue, at 32 rue de la Regence in Brussels, was designed by non-Jewish architect Desire DeKeyser and completed in 1878.

The "stately Romanesque" building also functions today as the home to several Jewish organizations, including the Jewish Consistoire and the Communaute Israelite de Bruxelles.

More than 20,000 Jews live in Brussels and about 42,000 live in all of Belgium.

The Conference of European Rabbis was established in 1956 as a federation of chief rabbis and senior rabbinical judges. Its current president is the chief rabbi of France, Joseph Sitruk, with Rabbi Sacks serving as associate president.

Video a staple of Palestinian propaganda only that Karsenty had the right to criticize the report and in doing so was sincere. Enderlin said he and the network planned to appeal.

The video at the heart of the case was shot at the Netzarim junction in Gaza on Sept. 30, 2000, by Palestinian cameraman Talal Abu Rahman, who worked for France 2. Enderlin was in Ramallah at the time. However, he narrated the report that aired, which was picked up around the world.

It showed al-Dura and his father crouching behind a barrel-shaped pipe in front of a wall, with the elder al-Dura apparently attempting to shield his son from Israeli fire. The video then shows the son lying prostrate, apparently shot. (Critics of France 2 noted al-Dura moved slightly even after Enderlin proclaimed him dead.)

Karsenty said the video became a staple of Palestinian propaganda to frame the intifadah as one of brutal Israelis shooting defenceless Palestinian children. He said his cause was not helped by Israel's apology before all the facts were in. He noted that the al-Dura image was on the wall behind U.S. reporter Daniel Pearl when he was killed by Al Qaeda.

After referring to the video as a hoax, he was sued for libel by France 2 and Enderlin. They won at trial, but last week the Paris Court of Appeal overturned that decision, leading Karsenty to claim victory.

Karsenty believes the appeal court decision leaves Enderlin "with no credibility."

He added: "I have the right to say that the report was faked, that we've been duped by them."

Despite the decision in what has been a high-profile case, there has been little media attention in France to his victory. It's been a virtual "blackout," he said.

"Nobody talks about the verdict in France. Try to find any written material in France. There is a strict law that France 2 has to be right and Karsenty has to be like a Holocaust denier," he quipped, referring to court manoeuvres by Enderlin's lawyer that tried to paint him as a crank.

"If I had lost, they would have covered it. But I won, so they're not paying attention to it. They don't want to inform the people. The situation in France in terms of the media is horrible.

"We live in a little USSR in France… The media outlets are lying. When it comes to certain subjects like the Middle East, they're openly lying. They're all telling the same lie."

Critics of the mainstream media's coverage of the intifadah argue it had been taken in by "Pallywood," an effort by Palestinians to fabricate phony incidents as part of a propaganda war against Israel. Richard Landes, an American professor with a blog at www.augeanstables.com, analyzed video shot by several news camera people on that day at Netzarim that show Palestinian youths repeatedly faking injuries. They are herded to waiting ambulances by frantic accomplices and the phony injuries are reported as real, he said in his blog.

The positive reality of Israel at 60

By HERSHELL EZRIN

Guest Voice

The last few weeks have seen the emergence of a host of media lemmings around the world competing to write the most catastrophic headlines about Israel's future. Samples range from "Is Israel finished?" to "Why Israel failed."

To bolster these prophesies, the media gurus turned to demographic factors; proposed advanced realpolitik arguments about the overwhelming threats of Iran, non-state terrorists and Islamist fundamentalism, and even pointed to the alleged fragility and lack of sense of purpose within the Israeli political and social systems.

Ignoring the historical reality that Israel at age one was no certainty, and that Israel's nation-building achievement remains unparalleled in the 20th century, these "post-modern nation state" pessimists have concluded that Israel's demise is only a matter of time.

The trouble is that no one bothered to let the Israelis know they should turn out the lights as they leave.

The Israel I visited last week was enjoying a damn good national celebration. And nowhere was the strength and vitality of Israel more clearly expressed than at President Shimon Peres' Facing Tomorrow conference.

World leaders, led by U.S. President George W. Bush, attended and spoke in unabashedly positive terms about Israel's success, vitality and creativity, not only compared to its neighbours but to the world at large.

Public Security Minister Stockwell Day led the Canadian contingent to the conference. And while a brilliant but disparate group of people such as Henry Kissinger, Bernard-Henri Levy, Abby Joseph Cohen and Amos Oz opined about Israel's achievements and challenges for the future, they all remained optimistic and committed to the Jewish state.

Hershell Ezrin

The next day, we discussed the future, and Israeli technology and inventiveness was central to it. In a panel on the "Future of the Internet" sat the founder of Google, the president of Yahoo, the former chair of Warner Brothers, the chair of Publicis (the world's third-largest advertising company) and a brazen Israelophile, Rupert Murdoch, all paying homage to the unique contributions of the Israeli scientific and technological community. No wonder they have all expanded, or are expanding, their operations in Israel.

As former U.S. ambassador Dennis Ross, chair of the Jewish People Public Policy Institute, said to me, "Look at the world coming to Israel – that's the surest and most credible rejection of the doom-and-gloom messages."

There were literally hundreds of new Israeli inventions on display around the conference hall, from water purification systems to significant advances in medical treatment, and even one that gives security services the ability to see through walls.

The icing on the cake was when the vice-president of research at British Telecom came out of the audience to tell one working session why his company is spending so much time learning and working with Israelis. At that point, even we non-techies got the message: Israel remains important to the world, and for reasons well beyond the conflict.

The numbers also speak for themselves. Israel's GDP per capita is more than 25 per cent higher than the OPEC state average. It also has an astonishing foreign direct-investment ratio, and Israel spends more on research and development as a percentage of GDP than any OECD state.

Globalization, it was argued, will benefit Israel more than other countries because of its economic structure and ethnic appreciation. Its entrepreneurs are plugged into global markets from day one. And more than one speaker reminded us that Israel is a country devoted to innovation. In the fast-paced, changing world of today, that is a remarkably competitive asset.

In focusing on the Jewish disposition to self-criticize and challenge authority, the pessimists misread the essential strength of Israeli and Jewish society. The critics ignore Israelis' overwhelming commitment to their country and to the world community, reinforced by the remarkable support of our Diaspora Jewish communities.

I walked away with my Canadian colleagues refreshed and re-energized.

It has problems, for sure, but this is one young 60-year-old.

Am Yisrael chai.

1948...They Were There

Canadian took part in the capture of the Galilee

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sam Wasser and his friends were going to a bar mitzvah in Buffalo, N.Y.

Some bar mitzvah.

In the spring of 1948, when he was only 19, Wasser volunteered to fight for Israel's independence as a sovereign state.

Having passed a medical and dental test, Wasser and nine other Canadian volunteers left Toronto, bound for the U.S. border and the battle zone in Palestine. Since the American government was not positively disposed to foreign citizens who volunteered their services to the Jewish or the Arab side, Wasser and his companions knew they could not very well tell customs officials at the border the unvarnished truth. Hence their tall tale about the bar mitzvah.

Wasser, born in Poland and raised in Toronto, went on to become an armoured car driver in the first Arab-Israeli war. As a member of the 79th division of the 7th Brigade, commanded by fellow Canadian Ben Dunkelman, he took part in Operation Hiram, the campaign to seize control of the entire Galilee.

"The year I spent in Israel was one of the best years of my life," he said in an interview a few weeks before going to Israel for a reunion of his fellow fighters. "It made me an adult and sealed my connection with Israel. I'm not 100 per cent pro-Israel. I'm 1,000 per cent pro-Israel. The bond between me and Israel will never be broken."

Now a retired insurance broker with four children and nine grandchildren, Wasser was recruited in the winter of 1947, nearly a year before the United Nations voted to partition Palestine – then a British League of Nations mandate – into a Jewish and an Arab state.

An alumnus of Hashomer Hatzair, the left-wing Zionist youth movement, he joined the struggle for Israeli statehood at a recruitment meeting at the Young Men's Hebrew Association in what is now mid-town Toronto.

At the end of it, Dunkelman, one of the speakers who had talked in urgent tones about the coming war in Palestine, asked all those aged 18 to 30 to stand up if they wished to join the Haganah, the chief fighting force of the Yishuv, the Jewish community in Palestine.

Wassser and seven others rose. All the rest sat in their seats.

"My four brothers had been in the Canadian forces during World War II, and now it was my turn," he explained. "It was my time to make a contribution to freedom."

After getting a clean bill of health, Wasser applied for a passport. Before getting it, he was asked whether he intended to travel to the Middle East. Wasser lied, saying he wanted to visit Britain and France, where his older brothers had been stationed and had fought during the war.

Upon reaching Buffalo, Wasser and his acquaintances took a train to New York City, where they met 21 other volunteers from Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver.

Four days later, having been outfitted with U.S. army surplus uniforms, they boarded a ship, the Marine Shark, heading to Le Havre, France. Prior to leaving New York, Wasser phoned his parents to break the news. "It wasn't a long conversation. My mother cried."

In Le Havre, they were met by a young woman who accompanied them to Paris. That night, they travelled by train to the southern French port of Marseilles. Taken to a nearby displaced persons camp, they relinquished their Canadian passports and were handed cards identifying them as Polish DPs. Wasser's new name was Sam Goldstein.

Shortly afterward, Wasser and 149 other volunteers boarded a fishing boat, the Marie Annik, in La Ciolat. The crew was French and the captain was an Israeli. They were at sea for 12 days. The voyage was eventful, he recalled. The crew was mostly drunk, there were engine and radio breakdowns, and the police chased the Marie Annik out of the harbour in Messina, Sicily.

When they landed, near Hadera, the state of Israel had already been proclaimed, prompting an invasion by five Arab armies and the bombardment of Tel Aviv. After a brief interlude in a refugee camp, the volunteers were transported by military truck to Camp Nesher, situated between Haifa and Acre. "All of us, in our hearts, felt we belonged here," he said.

Wasser on his armoured vehicle and with another soldier in the Israeli army in 1948.

Wasser was posted to the 72nd infantry battalion of the 7th Brigade, composed of some 50 Canadians and about 50 others from Britain, South Africa, Australia and the United States. "We were known as the Anglo-Saxim."

Apart from a little rifle training, he was kept busy digging trenches. to his disappointment. But one day, a Canadian volunteer from Montreal, Joe Weiner, announced that he was starting a new battalion, the 79th, and needed fresh recruits.

Wasser, having driven his family's grocery truck since he was 15, volunteered to drive an armoured vehicle. Aside from himself, the vehicle – a modified armour-plated White truck affixed with a turret – was manned by two gunners and a radio operator.

Wasser participated in the capture of three Arab villages, Sasa, Jish and Tarshiha, which commanded roads and junctions in the Galilee. His battalion battled Palestinian Arab irregulars, as well as Syrian and Iraqi soldiers. The 79th, which played a major role in the capture of Nazareth, also helped relieve Safad and Rosh Pina.

"You didn't see much. The battles always happened at night."

At Tarshiha, during an intense mortar and artillery barrage, he was slightly knicked in the foot by shrapnel.

With these victories, the fighters from the 7th Brigade were greeted rapturously by Israeli Jews. "They were shouting and singing, 'Kol haGalil shelanu, All the Galilee is ours.'"

Flushed with confidence, Wasser's unit drove deep into Lebanon, up to the Litani River, and remained in enemy territory for several hours.

"We were supposed to stop at the border, but since it was undefended, we kept on going. Lebanese civilians waved at us, thinking we were friendlies. When we reached a signpost saying that Beirut was 50 kilometres away, we turned around. We had gone far enough."

Some of the incidents he witnessed during the war were gory: revenge attacks by Irgun fighters and the shooting of a German war veteran who had fought with the Arabs.

Once hostilities ended, Wasser's job was to patrol the Lebanese and Syrian borders and to escort Arabs, who had returned to their homes without proper documentation, back into Lebanon.

"This was not to our liking, and after two such incidents, we said, 'This is not for us.'"

Wasser was offered a chance to become an officer in the Israeli army, but in the summer of 1949, he returned to Toronto to attend his sister's wedding after having missed a brother's wedding.

Like the vast majority of volunteers, he did not seriously consider the possibility of settling in Israel. "I had done my duty, and once I was at home, surrounded by family and friends, I decided to stay in Toronto."

A few years later, he married his fiance, Rosyln (Roz) Shore.

In retrospect, Wasser has no regrets. "I made a very small contribution, but to me it was the right thing to do."

Modi left investment banking for standup

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

While working in investment banking, Modi Rosenthal would imitate secretaries in his office to amuse friends and colleagues. One night in 1994, a friend suggested he step up on stage to do his shtick at a well-known New York City comedy club.

"The whole thing happened at the Comedy Cellar and then venues started getting bigger and better," says the Israeli American comedian over the phone from his home in Los Angeles.

"As time went on, my act changed – rather than doing imitations I had more of a voice."

Once Rosenthal, who's known professionally as Modi, left the world of finance in 1999, he focused on his standup routine, entertaining audiences in the United States and Canada. "I've done the Montreal Comedy Festival a few times and have been to Toronto – I love Canada," he says.

Modi is making a Toronto appearance at the Eglinton Grand for Chabad on the Avenue's annual benefit dinner. The June 12 event includes a silent auction.

The benefit will help support the Chabad's community-based Avenue Road Synagogue, the Jewish Women's Circle and the Jewish Learning Centre.

Modi, who moved from Israel to Long Island, N.Y., with his family when he was seven, became interested in performing comedy as an adult.

"The first time I went into a comedy club was when I first went up on stage, but growing up I loved the old comedians like Alan King – even when I was doing comedy on my own, I always looked up to that genre of comedians," Modi says.

Modi Rosenthal

One night the young comic met King at the Friars Club and he got some advice from the legendary comic. "He was very helpful. We met a few times and he saw my act. His wife's a big fan of mine," said Modi, who's been compared to Sid Caesar for the characters he creates.

One of the hottest comedians on the circuit, Modi writes his own material, drawing on everyday life. "I find my material is funnier when I bring the audience to whatever I'm going through," he says.

In addition to standup, Modi has appeared on NBC's Last Comic Standing and HBO's The Sopranos, and has had lead roles in films Waiting for Woody Allen and the award-winning Stand Up. He's been developing television pilots and independent films since he moved to Los Angeles six months ago.

In comedy, timing is everything – on and off stage. "A couple of weeks ago, Jackie Mason was supposed to do a show for Cheder Menachem in Los Angeles and he bailed out the day of the event," Modi says.

"I was called at four in the afternoon when I was literally on the treadmill at the gym and the rabbi said he had 250 people coming and they didn't have any entertainment. I ended up covering it."

The next day, Modi says the rabbis forwarded e-mails to Modi, saying, "Thank goodness Jackie Mason didn't come. We loved Modi!"

Constantly working on his act, Modi regularly tries out new routines at his favourite clubs, Los Angeles' Laugh Factory and New York's Comedy Strip and the Comedy Cellar, where his career began.

"It's [comedy is] definitely a talent. I'm always amazed when people tell me they're taking a comedy course. I don't know what that means," Modi says. "It's a craft you have to hone – to make new bits and make the bits you have, funnier and stronger. You can't go to school for it."

Bezmozgis, Horn pay tribute to Isaac Bashevis Singer

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Jewish writers David Bezmozgis of Toronto and Dara Horn of New York pay tribute to a Jewish-American literary legend on June 8 at Toronto's Luminato Festival, a vibrant 10-day arts celebration (June 6 to 15) with a rich program of literary, musical, dance, film, visual arts and other offerings.

Bezmozgis and Horn will celebrate the works of the late Nobel Prize-winning author Isaac Bashevis Singer in an afternoon program in which each will read a favourite passage from Singer's work, along with a selection from their own writing.

Bezmozgis, author of the acclaimed short story collection Natasha and Other Stories, is currently working on a novel and will probably read a section of his own work that has not yet been published, he told The CJN.

Singer has had a substantial influence on his writing, said Bezmozgis, whose own stories spotlight the community of Russian-Jewish émigrés that settled in north Toronto in the 1970s, '80s and '90s. "Singer really straddled two worlds, the old world and the new, and I think in a similar way I feel myself doing that as well," he said.

Many readers have "a very folksy perception" of Singer, Bezmozgis said, but often forget that a significant part of his work, "particularly his writing about people who survived the Holocaust and ended up in America, was often very cynical and certainly very skeptical."

David Bezmozgis

Nikki Yanofsky

He cited the novel Enemies: A Love Story, which he has read several times, as perhaps the Singer work that has influenced him the most.

Dara Horn, author of The World to Come, is a winner of the U.S. National Jewish Book Award and other literary prizes. Besides Bezmozgis and Horn, Humber College arts dean, Joe Kertesz, will moderate Luminato's Celebration of Isaac Bashevis Singer. It takes place at the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, 750 Spadina Ave. at Bloor, June 8, 3 p.m. Tickets are $10.

A program on the political graphic novel takes place in the same location a few hours later (7 p.m.) and features Bernice Eisenstein (I Was a Child of Holocaust Survivors), Spain Rodriguez (Che: A Graphic Biography) and Anthony Lappe and Dan Goldman (Shooting War). Tickets are $10.

Teresa Tova and Nikki Yanofsky are among the dozen or so singers and musical artists paying tribute to Canadian songwriters in a Luminato program called The Canadian Songbook. It's at Massey Hall on June 9, 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $40, $50 and $60. Visit the website luminato.com for further information on these and other fine Luminato programs.

Bay Street rocks for battle of the bands fundraiser

By DAVID BALE
Special to The CJN

The Bay Street Rollers take the stage as the audience hoots and howls. One of five amateur bands to perform this night, they belt out Love the One You're With, finishing off with a four-part harmony that even Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young would be proud of.

Their repertoire of rock classics from the 1970s, and '80s reveals their ages. They are younger than the Rolling Stones (but then, who isn't?) and older than your average MuchMusic video stars.

This is Baystock, the battle of the bands fundraiser that comes around every spring and has become a much-anticipated mainstay on the social calendar of Canada's chief financial district. Bay Street has found a way to give back to the community, to the tune of more than $100,000 raised annually for children's charities.

[Photos courtesy Baystock]

The rowdy bunch up front seems to be the Bay Street Rollers' own groupies, screaming like mini-skirted Beatle fans. In fact, some of them may have actually been original mini-skirted Beatle fans. They start chanting in unison, "Nor-man, Nor-man, Nor-man..."

Norman Shiner, that is – 42-year-old bass guitarist for the Rollers and Baystock's co-founder and moving force.

"You get a rock-star feeling when you get up on that stage," says Shiner, describing the rush shared by all the amateur musicians. "You feel like [Jon] Bon Jovi, but then you see the picture later, and you don't look like Bon Jovi."

What they do look like is more often a vision of graying temples, receding hairlines and a bit of paunch, which look perfectly acceptable in the starched collars and pin-striped suits of their day jobs.

These same baby boomers who let down their well-groomed, and often thinning, hair at Baystock are bankers, traders and CEOs.

"By day, stocks and bonds. By night, riffs and songs" is how Shiner, director of institutional equity sales at RBC Capital, describes the average Baystock musician's alter egos.

Baystock – which holds its 10th anniversary benefit at the Steam Whistle Brewery on May 29 – is Shiner's baby, and he talks about it with the same twinkle that he must have had in his eye when he and his colleagues conceived of it.

"In every setting, musicians tend to find each other," says Shiner.

Since his bar mitzvah, when his cantor told him he had a good voice and should use it, he has formed a rock band at every stage of life, from junior high to university.

And so it went in his professional career when he joined forces with Gordon Capital colleagues in 1998 to form a band called the G-Notes, to perform at company parties.

"People were quite shocked to see that these guys who they saw behind desks every day could get up on stage and play music," he says. "It was a huge hit."

It was around the water cooler one day that they dreamed up a way to take their music to another, more philanthropic, level.

"We thought, why not take this positive energy and raise some money to give back to society?" Shiner recalls. "We wanted to create a charitable foundation and involve our peers. And besides, we weren't good enough to get hired anywhere so we knew if we want to play anywhere we'd have to invent it ourselves."

Utilizing their collective business acumen, the committee established a foundation and planned their first event, which was a huge success. They sold 700 tickets for the 600-capacity Design Exchange, chosen for its symbolism as the original Toronto Stock Exchange trading floor.

"There was nothing like it on Bay Street. It was standing room only," he recalls.

"That first year, we raised $150,000 and distributed $100,000, and that has been our benchmark ever since."

Like the growth chart of a hot mutual fund, Baystock's success can be tracked in an upward climb. "Since its inception, Baystock has drummed up in excess of $1 million from ticket sales, auctions and donations," Shiner boasts. "Given it's an entirely volunteer organization, expenses are kept low relative to other charities."

Baystock's list of supporters reads like the ticker tape at the Toronto Stock Exchange – BMO Financial Group, Harris Steel, RBC Foundation, CI Investments, Telus Communication, Barrick Gold, CIBC World Markets and Scotia Capital, to drop just a few names. They have put up money – or bands – for the event. Royal Bank of Canada has put up all that and more. RBC Capital allows Shiner time at work to promote the event, while RBC Foundation has been a lead corporate donor.

Baystock has benefited more than 25 different youth charities, each year targeting three. On May 29, Bay Street executives will once again trade in their Blackberries for guitars for the benefit of SickKids Foundation, Starlight Canada and Shiner's "pet project," the Royal Conservatory of Music (RCM).

"It has a terrific outreach program which goes out into the communities and provides lessons for kids who can't afford them," he says.

It was at RCM that Shiner started his own musical training at the age of eight, learning to play classics on the violin. As a current RCM board member, Shiner feels he is giving back to the institution that introduced him to Bach, Beethoven, and Chopin and tolerated his roll over to rock in his teens.

Norman Shiner

Jeff Melanson can appreciate this. He is former dean of RCM's community school. "The man's a dynamo," he says referring to Shiner. "Norm is the driving force behind Baystock. I do not believe the event would exist without his talent, energy and commitment."

For Shiner, a former board member at Holy Blossom Temple, volunteerism is a lifestyle.

From 7 a.m. at his RBC desk to 7 p.m. at his family dinner table, the hours in between comprise only part of Shiner's typical day. Planning, soliciting and rehearsing for Baystock is a year-round volunteer venture that keeps him busy well after he and his guitar have serenaded his four daughters to sleep. So, on the balance sheet of family time, does his wife, Janet, rate Baystock a credit or a debit?

"A definite credit," she concedes. "Because it's wonderful that he has created this venue to channel his musical passion, it raises money for worthwhile causes, and he's a great role model for our kids regarding the importance of tzedakah."

Fans get into the groove during The Bay Street Rollers' set.

Baystock disbanded five years ago, only to be revived single-handedly by Shiner. Since then, the event has struck a chord heard around this country, as well as south of the border, where the Baystock format has been admired and copied numerously. Dean Connor – a senior executive at Sun Life Financial and guitarist for three-time Baystock winning band the Binder Brothers – calls Shiner the foundation's "cornerstone."

"The event continues to change, much of it due to Norm's influence, which helps with its longevity," Connor says.

The Binder Brothers return this year to battle the bands Black Monday, Hedge Fun, the Biznoids, Second Pass, and Incident 11 – all composed of execs from major Canadian banks and insurance and telecommunications companies.

Singer-songwriter Marc Jordan, renowned for such hits as Marina Del Ray and Rhythm of My Heart, is this year's MC.

Shiner and his Bay Street Rollers won't perform any numbers this time. They will be keeping the beat from the sidelines and watching the other numbers, most notably the bottom line.

Folk choir performs operetta based on Aleichem story

By LAURE BAUDOT
Special to The CJN

Despite some recent challenges, the members of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir sing on.

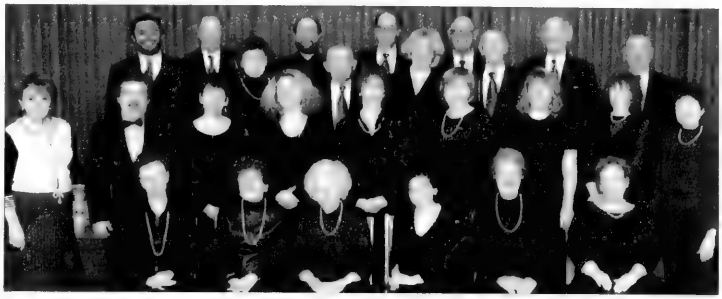
The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir will perform its 82nd annual spring concert at Leah Posluns Theatre on June 1, at 2 p.m.

The program includes Oyfn Fidl, an operetta by Russian-born American-Jewish composer Vladimir Heifetz, and Hebrew songs in honour of Israel's 60th anniversary.

Factory workers founded the choir in 1925 to perpetuate the Yiddish and working-class musical tradition. Most of the founders didn't read music.

Despite its humble origins, the choir has been immensely successful. During the 1950s, it had more than 100 members and collaborated with renown orchestras, including the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. The choir "packed Massey Hall two nights in a row," notes Peter Kastner, the choir's librarian.

Today, members come from all over the world. Many are middle class, and most can read music. The choir eschews politics, mostly through its repertoire, which reflects Diaspora Judaism and is non-nationalistic.



This year's Toronto Jewish Folk Choir [David Smiley photo]

Alexander Veprinsky, a Ukrainian Canadian who has been conducting the choir since 2002, was referring to his experience living in the Soviet Union when he said: "I've [become] a little bit tired of politics. I would like to do music."

Yet the choir faces difficulties. Choir numbers are down to 30, which Ben Shek, chair of the program committee, blames on a diminishing Yiddish-speaking community. And the choir is suffering financially.

The choir's challenges, as well as its strengths, were evident at a recent rehearsal at the Winchevsky Centre in Toronto. During rehearsal, the choristers were restless, and Veprinsky rang a little bronze bell to get the singers' attention. Once he asked, half-jokingly, "Why are you talking when you should be singing?"

And yet the choir's commitment shone through, and pieces were reworked phrase by phrase, to Veprinsky's satisfaction.

The choir's greatest strength is its members' passion. Most of its singers are personally linked with Yiddishkeit. Choir president Enid Moscovitch says singing is an "emotional experience" for her.

The choir's vibrant repertoire deserves enthusiasm. The mood of Oyfn Fidl is at times yearning, mournful and funny – those watching the rehearsal sometimes laughed out loud. The Hebrew marching songs are equally entertaining, compelling the audience to tap their feet to the music.

These days, the choir is adapting to a changing Jewish demographic. Although the choir's repertoire continues to include many songs with Yiddish lyrics, participants have translated some parts into English. In this way, the choir's Yiddish flavour has been retained, while it broadens their audience by allowing non-Yiddish-speaking members to understand the pieces' narratives.

Choral members are also considering new fundraising practices, which Moscovitch thinks may increase interest in fundraising among the choir's younger singers.

In the Sholem Aleichem story on which Oyfn Fidl is based, the young protagonist gives up the violin. But in the musical version of the story, the choir has the last word, praising the violin and chanting: "Fingers dance over the strings… rai, rai, rai… dance!" When they sang the final notes of the piece at the recent rehearsal, the singers' triumphant mood was in keeping with Heifetz's score.

Tickets are $23; $19 for seniors and students; free for children 12 and under. Call 416-636-0936 or 416-593-0750. www.winchevskycentre.org/institutions/choir.html

Musicians perform Jacques Brel in English and French

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

A performance by singer Judith Lander touched one music lover so much that he remembered it 10 years later.

As a result, Pablo Keselman arranged to introduce Lander to French-born pianist, singer, composer Philippe Noireaut, who now lives in Montreal.

The musical pairing of the anglophone singer from Winnipeg with Noireaut was so magical that Toronto jazz aficionado Sybil Walker has booked them into this year's cabaret series, as part of the TD Canada Trust Toronto Jazz Festival's Cabaret at The Old Mill.

Oakville, Ont.-based Lander and Noireaut will perform the music of French composer Jacques Brel on June 25 and 26 at 8 p.m., he in French, and she primarily in English.

The audience can expect to hear some of the richest lyrics ever written for music, Lander says.

Although Brel died in 1978, his music lives on. "He was a genius," she says. "He wrote songs that dealt with humanity, war, love, children, life experiences and the little idiosyncrasies in human beings.

"Brel is one of the greatest songwriters one can sing. It's very rare these days, in the culture that we live in, to have music and lyrics that touch the human heart and really mean something. There is so much superficiality in what one sees – it is a real thrill to be able to do music like this."

Both cabaret performers have had extensive experience performing Brel's work.

A veteran vocalist, actress, teacher and composer, Lander has sung on stages across the continent including on Broadway. Her compositions for ballet include Diary and have been performed by prestigious companies including the National Ballet of Canada, the Hubbard Street Company of Chicago and the American Ballet Theater.

Known as a singer's singer, she is considered by many in the field as an expert in cabaret genres, especially the work of Brel and of composer Kurt Weill. Lander performed the English musical Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris across North America for more than 10 years, a highlight being a evening with Brel himself at Carnegie Hall.

As for her concert partner, she says "Philippe has a vast repertoire of Brel music. He has played for some of the greatest singers in France.

"I will be doing a number of songs from Jacques Brel is Alive, and Philippe will be doing many of the songs that Brel is famous for in French. We will also be singing some songs together. He will be playing piano and I will be accompanying myself for a song or two"

There will also be "an integration of the English journey and the French journey of the music," she adds. "Brel is not considered jazz, but the night will have many styles of music, including little touches of jazz. Philippe is a great jazz musician."

Lander's musical offerings will include Sons Of, a well-known anti-war song from the English Brel show, as well as Carousel and Marieke.

The two are hoping that their Toronto Jazz Festival cabaret performance is the first of many and wish to collaborate again in the near future and possibly record a CD. Lander feels it would make for an amazing recording.

For information on Judith Lander and Philippe Noireaut's upcoming performances at The Old Mill, 21 Old Mill Rd., go online to www.torontojazz.com. For tickets, call 416-870-8000; for dinner reservations, phone 416-236-2641.

A rediscovery of Jewish Ukraine

By NORMAN RAVVIN

Throughout the Cold War era, only the most intrepid traveller went to eastern Europe. With police surveillance and the worst of Soviet-style tourist amenities on offer, events in Poland and points east were largely the domain of diplomats and the most adventurous journalists and scholars.

Norman Ravvin

The transformation of this scenario is brought home in a recent travelogue by Omer Bartov, who teaches history at Brown University and has published scholarly works on the Holocaust. Erased: Vanishing Traces of Jewish Galicia in Present-Day Ukraine (Princeton University Press) is not a scholarly study, although it is well researched. Rather, it's based on Bartov's travels in what is now independent Ukraine, along with his extensive reading of postwar yizkor bicher, or memory books associated with prewar Jewish life.

Bartov's family comes from this part of the world, as did such literary luminaries as Bruno Schulz of Drohobych and the Nobel laureate S.Y. Agnon, who spent his youth in Buchach. Known before the war as Galicia and Bukovina, this part of eastern Europe also has a rich chassidic history.

The bulk of Erased is a travelogue that takes readers through what were once major Jewish centres, as well as smaller towns. Beginning in the northwest, near to Poland, Bartov treks east, from Sambir and Drohobych, through Kilomyia, Buchach, winding up in Ternopil and Brody.

The history of the latter city conveys the depth of Jewish history in this part of the world. Jewish inhabitants are recorded in Brody from the town's inception in the late 16th century, and throughout its pre-World War II existence, Jews numbered more than half the population.

Bartov doesn't focus on prewar life beyond his effort to account for the size of Jewish communities before the outbreak of World War II, and to convey how each place was affected by earlier disasters associated with pogroms, World War I and the aftermath of the Russian Revolution.

These events make their way into Agnon's fiction, and the novel that matches Bartov's depiction of social and cultural history is A Guest for the Night, which first appeared in Hebrew in 1939. There Agnon describes, with great and delicate sympathy, the decay and distress of Jewish settlements in this part of Europe before the catastrophe of German invasion during World War II.

Erased has two goals: to convey the prewar mix of Ukrainian, Polish and Jewish culture in the places Bartov visits, as well as to record the postwar erasure of all markings and remembrances of Jewish habitation. In the places he visits he takes an accounting of what remains of the Jewish presence – often just the shell of a once-grand synagogue and a desecrated or obliterated cemetery ground.

Monuments and commemorative plaques are of particular interest, and Bartov pays special attention to the way Soviet and more recent Ukrainian commemorative language tends, almost universally, to evade the Jewishness of a great number of the territory's victims of war and civilian atrocities. Ukrainian collaboration with the Nazis remains a taboo subject, and in the most egregious cases, the Ukrainian nation is depicted as the prime victim of war and fascist ideology, with Jews blamed for both.

Although aspects of this history have been explored by Holocaust specialists, as well as by writers interested in depicting prewar Jewish life, it's not familiar ground for the average reader. In this way, Bartov returns a territory he refers to as "the Borderland"– neither Poland nor Russia, but a lesser-known zone in between – to common knowledge.

There is a good deal of pathos involved in Bartov's visit to what was once Jewish Galicia, and even though he doesn't make a great deal of use of interviews or interactions with locals, he recounts a number of surprising incidents. His 2004 photo of the corner in Drohobych where Bruno Schulz was murdered reveals that the streetscape has changed little. And upon visiting Chortkiv, he finds the marketplace in the midst of renovations. "It was a matter of sheer luck" he tells us, "to have come that day. The sun was shining, the atmosphere was festive, and the faded Polish and Jewish names painted on the walls could clearly be seen. A few days later, and the words would have been neatly painted over and just as quickly forgotten. But on that day the long dead M. Tauber and Leib Wasserman were still advertising their paint and iron store right next to the 'Catholic Butcher.'"

It's this erasure of Jewish presence in present-day Ukraine that Bartov conveys to his reader, and in the process, he goes some distance toward renewing our awareness of prewar Jewish Galicia.

Norman Ravvin is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His books include the edited volumes Not Quite Mainstream: Canadian Jewish Short Stories and The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader, co-edited with Richard Menkis.

Wrestling champ comes with athletic pedigree

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — It's only with the swift passing of our years that most of us begin to be even remotely interested in our lineage and feel the need to learn more about our ancestors.

Take, for example, 13-year-old Caleb Rutner, a Grade 7 student at Winnipeg's River Heights Junior High School. Just weeks ago, Rutner won the gold medal in the 52-kilogram bantam division at the Canadian National Wrestling Championships in Saskatoon.

Caleb, it turns out, has a rich history and a gene pool to match that no doubt contributed to his superior performance on the mat.

When asked why he became involved with wrestling as early as age six, he explained: "My dad asked me if I wanted to try it out. He was a wrestler back in his college days in New York and Nebraska. He was born in the Bronx."

Caleb's father, Toby Rutner, a local psychologist, later explained: "I was a high school wrestler in New York and went to Nebraska State in Wayne, Neb., on a scholarship."

"Since you are looking into Caleb's pedigree," he continued, " it might interest you to know that my dad was Mickey Rutner, a major league baseball player who played for the old Philadelphia Athletics [in the American League]. He recently died, and since he at one point in his career played baseball for the Toronto Maple Leafs, there was a very large obit on him in the Globe and Mail." (The Maple Leafs were a AAA ball team in the International League which folded in 1967.)

Caleb Rutner

The proud dad added that his widowed mother, Lee, a dancer, was a member of the famous Rockettes, a 75-year-old group that still performs mainly at Radio City Music Hall in New York.

As for Caleb's zaide, Mickey, he died last Oct. 17 at age 88. At the time, he held the distinction of being the oldest living Jewish major leaguer.

The onetime third baseman had the proverbial cup of coffee in the majors. His short stay in the show was not due to lack of talent, but because of the anti-Semitism often faced by Jewish athletes back then.

Mickey was called up to the A's in September 1947 at age 27 and played in 12 games. He managed 12 hits in 48 at bats for a .250 average that included a double and a home run, along with four RBIs.

A book, Man on Spikes, was written about a fictional character named "Mike Kutner," who was apparently based on the career of Mickey Rutner. The author was Eliot Asinof, who once played minor league ball with Rutner and who also wrote the well-known book that was made into a movie, Eight Men Out, about the 1919 Black Sox gambling scandal.

As for Caleb, asked how he feel about capturing a national wrestling title, he said, "I don't want to seem that I'm gloating, but I am pretty proud.

"My coach, Kris Stasiak, who is a former Polish Olympic wrestling star who wrestled in the Olympics, has contributed a lot to my success. I don't think I could do it without him."

Altogether, 10 wrestlers vied for the national title, and Caleb had to defeat three opponents: one from London, Ont., followed by another from British Columbia and a third from Alberta.

Earlier in the month, Caleb, along with a few other wrestling mates from his Winnipeg Wrestling Club, competed in a tournament in Grand Forks, N.D., where he added to his growing pile of medals and trophies with two golds for Greco-Roman wrestling and another gold for freestyle.

Naturally, Caleb is familiar with the shenanigans that go on in professional wrestling and isn't overly impressed. "TV wrestling, that's just fake stuff. It doesn't come close to any of the wrestling styles in amateur. Ultimate fighting contests are sort of brutal. Sometimes I sort of just turn away," he said.

The best, it appears, is yet to come. Caleb is set to become a travelling man in September when his club heads to Poland for a competition against European wrestlers. While there, he will also expand his knowledge of Jewish history with a trip to Auschwitz.

As for the future, he wants to represent Canada in the Olympics and the Maccabiah Games.

Considering his background, work ethic, and family history, don't bet against it.

Krayzelburg inspires essay contest

DELRAY BEACH, Fla. — Four-time Olympic gold medalist Lenny Krayzelburg will serve as honorary lead judge of the fourth Sport and Jewish Life essay contest. This year's contest coincides with the summer Olympic Games and the quest of athletes across the globe to reach this event.

The topic, "What does it take to succeed in sports?" is one that Krayzelburg is quite familiar with. The Ukrainian-born swimmer took gold in swimming in both the 2000 and 2004 Olympics.

Entrants are invited to share their own stories or discuss the experiences of others in their lives or what they have observed regarding high-profile athletes or sports in general. Essays should incorporate a discussion of Jewish values, teachings from the Torah or other Jewish texts or practices, as well as other literature or films of interest.

Entries will be judged in three age categories: grades 6 to 9, grades 10 to12, post-secondary students and others. Winners will be awarded U.S. Savings Bonds. Deadline to submit essays is June 23.

For contest application forms or more information, visit www.CSJL.org, or contact the centre at JewishSports@gmail.com.

This birthday is no big deal

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

There are two sorts of people in this world: those who make a big deal out of birthdays, and those who don't.

If you're in the former category, you look forward with anticipation each year to your birthday in the hope, or expectation, that friends and family will shower you with praise, parties and gifts. If you're in the latter group, you likely see your birthday as just another day, in real terms no different, and certainly no more special, than any other 24-hour period of the year. Also, if you're in the latter category, you are right: nothing actually changes on a birthday. Birthdays and anniversaries are for show – to realize this is to conclude that there's really nothing special about them and no reason to celebrate.

But based on content in newspapers, magazines and TV, one must assume that the media is big on birthdays. For weeks now, everyone has been opining on Israel's 60th birthday, mostly within the framework of questioning whether Israel can survive in either the short or long term.

All the media attention took me by surprise. It seems odd to me that everyone has suddenly decided to make such a fuss over Israel's future.

In most cases, the commotion surrounds this hypothesis: Israel faces a greater threat to its continued existence now than at any time since 1948. The Iranians are going to get nukes, Hamas is the legitimately elected governing body in Gaza, rockets are tearing up houses and gardens in Sderot and the Israel Defence Forces is still reeling from the smackdown it received in Lebanon two summers ago.

Take a deep breath. If you unpack all that scary stuff, things don't seem so bad, really. The Iranians don't have any nuclear bombs yet, while Israel does. Plus, Israel has proved – twice now, in Iraq and more recently Syria – that it won't tolerate another nuclear arsenal in the neighbourhood. Rest assured, also, that the Israelis will get much encouragement (read: military help from the United States) if Iran actually ever gets close to building the bomb.

As for Hamas, the Israeli government is actually playing this one quite well – slowly starving Gaza into some sort of submission, be it an internal revolt or ceasefire/peace talks.

True, Lebanon was a bust, but Israel didn't lose, even if it didn't win. It looked bad, but you're going to lose every once in a while, and the IDF would appear to be in the process of making sure the mistakes in Lebanon are not repeated. Not winning in Lebanon was embarrassing, but it was also not a catastrophe.

And Sderot is Israel's own fault. It pulled out of Gaza – on the false assumption that doing so would increase security – and it will, eventually, have to take the land back. Like the Lebanon war, Sderot is less an Arab victory than an Israeli blunder.

All told, the threats to Israel's existence – both realized and existential – aren't much different than they were five, 10 or 20 years ago. What's more, the total threat to Israel probably isn't going to change dramatically in the near future, and certainly not for the worse.

My best guess is that Israel will still be around 60 years from now. Follow the historical line from 1948 to 2008 and the trend for Israel is a healthy one. It has expanded, fought off radical, bloodthirsty enemies over and over again, and matured into the sort of state that exudes all the good (and some of the bad) that comes with being a western-style democracy.

Israel's is a good story.

Are there threats to Israel's existence? Sure. But there always have been, and there always will be. Sixty years later, that reality is one we should learn to accept – Israelis certainly have – and move on.

This birthday, when you think about, isn't worth making a big deal over.

RIB EYE STEAKS WITH MELON RELISH

- 1 med. red onion, diced
- 2 tblsp olive oil
- 1/2 c fresh mint, chopped
- 1 lg cantaloupe, peeled, seeded, diced
- 1/2 tsp fresh ground pepper
- 1 c Italian parsley, chopped
- 3 lbs. individual rib eye steaks
- 2 tblsp cider vinegar
- 2 tsp sea salt

Toss cantaloupe, onion, parsley, mint, vinegar & oil in bowl. Set aside. Heat grill or large skillet over high heat. Season steaks on both sides with salt and pepper. Cook 5-8 min. for medium or to desired doneness. Remove from heat; rest on cutting board 5-7 minutes. Cut steak diagonally into 1/8" thick slices; transfer to platter. Spoon half the relish on top. Serve remaining relish on the side.

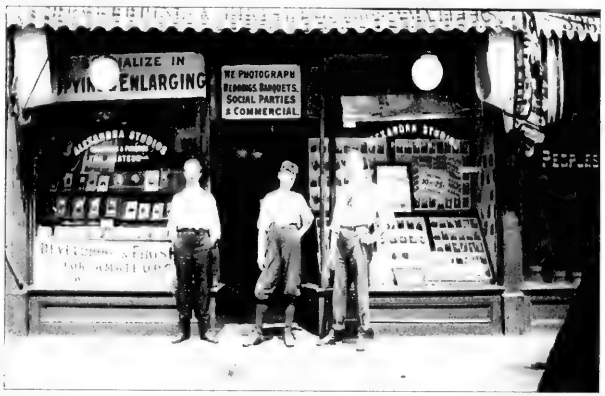
A Family Business for over 60 Years

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS



PORTRAIT PHOTOGRAPHERS: Chicago-born Louis Turofsky borrowed $165 to purchase the long-established Alexandra Studios of Toronto around 1908 and went into the photography business with his younger brother Nathan. Over the years they produced a vast number of postcard-sized portraits, including many from the Jewish community. Here, Lou and two others (perhaps Nat and youngest brother Sam) stand outside the shop at 338 Queen Street West in the early 1920s. Lou and Nat became well-known sports photographers who specialized in the six original teams of the NHL. [City of Toronto Archives]

Our community's 'A' and 'B' list

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

We live in a vital community, but we're not flawless. Many of our flaws have gone unspoken and in the process have hurt many people.

Through my years as a Jewish community professional, I have talked with dozens of homegrown Jews and immigrants from places such as Winnipeg; Morocco; Brantford, Ont.; Israel and Halifax, who have expressed a painful truth of feeling disenfranchised living in the Toronto Jewish community because of a system that can be very judgmental with some unreasonable expectations.

Lorne Opler, 48, is one of those people. He was born in Toronto to a family with blue-collar roots, a fate that can be most difficult in our city.

"As a child I was conditioned to undervalue my father's work because he was part of the retail class, not of the professional class," Lorne said. "Because of the Jewish community's culture, which puts value on white collar professionals, only as an adult have I come to appreciate my father's working-class background."

He added that his quiet disappointment came from his years in Jewish day schools, where students were generally not encouraged to become musicians if they were passionate about music or carpenters if they loved creating with wood.

"Every kid is unique and should be seen as such," Lorne said. "How many people are there in our community wishing they were painting a canvas rather than analyzing a year-end statement?"

Lorne makes a sound argument that still applies today. Indeed, how many people reading this article wanted to become an author but felt there was something lacking in them if they pursued their dream? How many of our members chose their profession because of community and/or family pressure and have the same expectations of their children?

This need to see ourselves as high profile in the area of career choice likely started a century ago, when Jews were marginalized by their host countries and we needed to be seen to be safe.

Today, when we meet someone new at shul or an event, the first question we ask is, "So what do you do?" What we want to hear is, "I am a successful and affluent professional or entrepreneur." The auto mechanics just don't cut it in our community, regardless of their contribution, and if they did, you would see more of them being honoured at our galas.

And the truth is, calling a plumber up to the dais for years of precious community work doesn't raise money. And in our community, money is status. I know this stuff; I run an organization and in many ways am part of this system.

Unfortunately, this approach, according to Lorne, has created a community "A" and "B" list. The "A" list is made up of those who have worked hard for personal wealth, or inherited it, volunteer for larger institutions, and fit well into middle-of-the-road Judaism that speaks on behalf of the Jewish people. Those on the "B" list practise their community membership quietly, often on the sidelines, and seldom are asked for their opinion about things integral to the Jewish world and our town. Both are good folk, but only one feels part of the big picture.

As a community, we need to see our flaws and consider how painful it must be to feel marginalized and without a voice. It's important that we are authentically introspective so we can create an even more vibrant environment for every Jew, and a community that celebrates its Torah scholars, doctors, artists, lawyers, teachers and businesspeople.

Israeli soldiers' remains released

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Lebanese security sources are saying that the Lebanon-based guerrilla group Hezbollah, which on Sunday handed over the remains of what it claimed were Israeli soldiers, still has more Israeli bodies, the Lebanese newspaper A Safir reported Monday.

The sources added that among the body parts still in Hezbollah's possession is "an almost entire body," the newspaper reported. "It is apparent that this embodies an element of pressure on the Israeli government," the report said.

Hezbollah transferred the remains via the International Committee of the Red Cross, saying they were body parts belonging to Israel Defence Forces soldiers who were killed during the Second Lebanon War in 2006. Israel later announced that the handover was not part of a broader prisoner exchange deal.

Hezbollah 'trading in human parts'

The Prime Minister's Office said it was surprised by the handover, which took place after Israel released convicted Hezbollah spy Nassim Nasser from prison and returned him to Lebanon.

But some Israeli sources said Hezbollah's handover and Israel's release of Nasser were both agreed-on, confidence-building steps that constitute the first phase of a more extensive swap that would include Hezbollah's release of abducted IDF soldiers Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser.

Other Israeli sources, however, said the transfer of the remains was orchestrated to win over public opinion in Lebanon by giving the impression that it was part of a prisoner exchange, even though Nasser's release was a technical matter, since he had completed his term and Israel could no longer legally keep him incarcerated.

"The step is not a goodwill gesture, but Hezbollah spin for public opinion in Lebanon," an Israeli security source said. "This is not part of the prisoner exchange deal, it wasn't co-ordinated with Israel, and from the beginning, our position has been that we will not conduct any negotiations for body parts and we will not agree to trade in body parts, or to pay for them."

A senior military official said that "at the beginning of the year, [Hezbollah leader Hassan] Nasrallah spoke and said he had body parts. Israel reacted angrily because he was trading in human parts… Now that we tossed them Nasser, Nasrallah is trying to create the appearance of an achievement in the Lebanese street

Israel Day in Toronto

Thousands of Toronto-area residents and supporters of Israel came to Mel Lastman Square on Sunday to celebrate the city's 13th annual Israel Day Festival . The event – sponsored by Na'amat Canada and the Canadian Zionist Federation – featured a vibrant shuk, live music, Israeli food and an auction. At right, an attendee is instructed on how to put on tfillin by one of the many rabbis who patrolled the festival.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Canadians Ordained

TORONTO — Three Torontonians were ordained as rabbis May 31 by Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati. They are: Rena Arshinoff, interim spiritual leader at Solel Congregation in Mississauga, Ont., since January; William Tepper, a former drama and English teacher who joins Mizpah Congregation in Chattanooga, Tenn., as spiritual leader this summer, and Noah Chertkoff, an ex-aide to former federal minister Elinor Caplan, who becomes assistant rabbi at a temple in Plantation, Fla., this summer. A fourth Canadian, Daniel Mikelberg of Vancouver, was ordained by HUC's Los Angeles campus last month.

Rush Donates Cash

WINNIPEG — The members of veteran Canadian rock band Rush said last week they will donate $100,000 from their May 24 concert in Winnipeg to the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, a public-private project to be completed by 2011 in the Manitoba capital. The trio will also sell T-shirts at the remaining Canadian dates on their current tour, with proceeds going to the museum. They read: "My pals Rush and I support the Canadian Museum for Human Rights." The parents of Rush's lead singer, Geddy Lee, 54 – born Gary Lee Weinrib – are Holocaust survivors. The $265-million museum is being spearheaded by the Asper family, which has raised about $95 million of $105 million in private money needed to build it.

Vandalism Denounced

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress strongly condemned a recent act of vandalism at Montreal's Makkah-al-Mukarramah mosque, the third such attack there this year. Worshippers arrived May 24 to find a smashed stained glass window on the mosque's front door. "It is unacceptable to see these types of acts against places of worship," said Victor Goldbloom, CJC's Quebec region president. "As Jews, we know all too well the pain of such desecrations. It is the duty of all Quebecers to… denounce all forms of hatred."

Polish Jewish Partisan Leader Fought Nazis

Eta Wrobel's 2006 book

Born Eta Chajt in Lukow, Poland, she was the only one in her large family to survive the Nazis' 1942 liquidation of their ghetto.

When the Nazis arrived, Wrobel fled to the woods outside Lukow and commanded a unit of refugees. They stole supplies from the Germans and set mines to hinder them.

On one mission she was shot in the leg. She walked with a bullet in her leg for months.

Wrobel travelled throughout New Jersey decades after the war telling schoolchildren about her experiences.

In 2006, she wrote her memoir, My Life My Way, with Jeanette Friedman.

WORLD

Tootsie Director Dies

LOS ANGELES — Sydney Pollack, the acclaimed director of Tootsie and Out of Africa, died of cancer May 26 at his home in Los Angeles at age 73. Pollack, who won an Academy Award for Out of Africa, was the son of Russian-Jewish immigrants. He also acted in television and movies.

Rabbi In Brazil?

TEL AVIV — A radical Israeli rabbi alleged to have led followers to commit horrific acts of child abuse is believed to be hiding in Brazil. Israeli police said May 29 that Rabbi Elior Chen, who fled the country after reports of serial child by his followers, is in Brazil, where police are searching for him. Previously, he was said to be hiding in Canada. The rabbi allegedly counselled followers to severely beat and burn children in order to rid them of the devil. Some of the abuses have resulted in life-threatening injuries. One child remains in a vegetative state.

Harvey Korman, 81

LOS ANGELES — Harvey Korman, who gained fame on TV's Carol Burnett Show, died May 29 in Los Angeles at 81 from complications due to the rupture of an abdominal aortic aneurysm four months ago. The lanky comedian was also known for his role as a devious politician in Mel Brooks 1974 film Blazing Saddles.

Toronto Israelis unite in single organization

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

A dozen independent Israeli groups that met in Toronto recently became part of a single organization by joining the Israeli Forum.

The forum, formed three years ago, is supported by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and now has 4,000 members. Ehud Telem, a forum board member, said he expects the numbers to double in the next two years.

The Israeli Forum was created to organize the Israeli community in Toronto of about 50,000, Telem said.

The majority of Israelis who now live in Toronto moved to the city in the past decade. "The Jewish community cannot ignore such a huge number of Jews," he said. Israelis make up about one-quarter of the city's Jewish population.

The founding members of the forum believed that many Israelis were falling through the cracks in the Jewish community because they didn't know what services were available to them.

"The nature of Israelis in general is that they are very secular," Telem said. "[But] just because they are secular doesn't mean they don't want their kids to get a good Jewish education. We also realized that if Israelis are not brought into the established community, we would have a big problem of intermarriage."

> 'Great move in bringing them closer to the Jewish community'

The Israeli supplementary school Kachol Lavan, established by the forum, now has 180 students. A summer camp by the same name, operating out of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, was also created for Israeli-Canadian children.

The chairman of the Israeli Forum, Gil Blutrich, who helped bring about the Israeli groups' unification, said the merger is one of the first serious attempts to integrate Israeli immigrants into a Jewish community.

Through the forum, a business group called the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, whose goal is foster interaction between Canadian and Israeli corporations, was formed.

"Hamifgash (Hebrew for "meeting") – the group's cultural wing – has organized several activities, including Yom Ha'aztmaut celebrations and an event honouring the Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon. There have also been film screenings and a Purim carnival, and there is a Hebrew book club. Some events have been presented in conjunction with the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, which will be part of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan. The forum hopes to build an Israeli heritage centre on the Lebovic Jewish Campus.

In the first week of the Second Lebanon War in 2006, several hundred people affiliated with the Israeli Forum gathered at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel in Toronto and raised $160,000 in emergency funds for Israel.

Blutrich said that federation president Ted Sokolsky made an important gesture in January 2006 when he met with 30 Israeli businessmen to discuss building the coalition.

Galya Sarner, the UJA's Israeli-community project leader, said: "[The group is a] great move in engaging the Israeli community and bringing them closer to the Jewish community."

David Zaltzman, secretary of the forum, noted that a survey published in 2004, commissioned by federation, outlined how the Israeli community is in conflict with the mainstream Jewish community. The coalition should minimize this conflict, he said.

"We now have a unified group that can help Israelis better understand one another, and have the established Jewish community understand the Israeli community."

Survivor of Schindler factory to speak

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Leib Lejzon was 13 years old when he began work at Oskar Schindler's factory, Emalia Deutsch Emailwaren Fabrik, where he worked 12-hour shifts. The diminutive boy had to stand on an upturned box to reach the machinery. Schindler, who took a liking to the lad, called him "Little Leyson."

Now referred to as Leon Leyson, he is the youngest survivor on Schindler's List, number 289, out of more than 1,200 people. He endured the Holocaust through the bravery and ingenuity of Schindler. Leyson's miraculous survival has compelled him to tell his story to ensure it is not forgotten.

Leyson will be speaking in Toronto on June 16 at the Leah Posluns Theatre, sponsored by Uptown Chabad, and hosted by Marci Ien, news anchor of CTV's Canada AM.

"Everybody knows he was not a perfect man," said Leyson of Schindler. "He liked the good life, he was a partier, a womanizer – all of these things people say about him, which are true. But he had a great heart."

Schindler worked to treat his employees with the compassion they lacked elsewhere and even spoke to his factory workers. "It's as if I were a real human being. Sometimes he'd order extra rations for me. Things like that, personal things, which made him so much more human, so much more of a decent human being," Leyson said.

After Steven Spielberg's film Schindler's List was released in 1993, Leyson began speaking about his experiences during the Holocaust.

"The movie Schindler's List made such an impact because it emphasized individual human beings rather than a mass of people murdered or corpses being shoved into a ditch," Leyson told The CJN.

"Too many people just simply know the numbers. Nazis were not killing numbers. There's no way to understand six million. They were individual people. A brother, sister, somebody's uncle, somebody's aunt. I really want to emphasize that."

Five of Leyson's immediate family were on Schindler's list and survived. Leyson's two eldest brothers and all of his extended family, however, were murdered.

Leon Leyson

Many of the factory workers would be informed by Schindler about the war and what had been happening to Jews in Europe. There was a Nazi death camp, Plasow, two miles from the factory, and yet, Schindler's workers celebrated life the best way they could.

"The Nazis tried to dehumanize us all the time. They tried to break our humanity, but everybody resisted," he said. "We played games, told jokes, and sang songs as a way to keep our humanity."

When Hitler's invasion of Europe began, most Jews were in disbelief or denial about the Nazis' intentions, Leyson said.

"People thought the war would be over soon. Adults thought [laws against Jews] was the worst thing that would happen. It was not obvious for a long time what Nazis had in mind," he said. "As soon as people started to be transferred to the gas chambers, people started to realize what was happening. No one in their right mind could have predicted."

After World War II, Leyson and his parents headed back to their small town in Poland. "We didn't have anything. We were not received too cordially when we came back. It was so terrible that I don't want to elaborate."

As Poland became communist, they eventually fled to Germany, where they spent three years in a displaced-persons camp, near Frankfurt Am Main.

He and his parents immigrated to the United States in 1949, sponsored by an uncle and aunt. He served in the army during the Korean War.

In 1965, 20 years after the last time Leyson, then 36, saw him, Schindler visited Los Angeles to see some of the workers who immigrated to the United States, and to receive some financial support, since his fortune had taken a turn for the worse. He recognized Leyson immediately.

"I thought I had better introduce myself," Leyson said. "But he said, 'you're Little Leyson!'"

Cancer unit to test for genetic mutations

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For the first time, Ashkenazi Jewish women can be tested at no cost for the BRCA1 and BRCA2 genetic mutations, even without a personal or family history of breast or ovarian cancer, thanks to the familial breast cancer research unit at Women's College Research Institute.

The simple blood test is part of a research study that aims to evaluate how common these mutations are in the Jewish population of Ontario and to see whether it is possible to identify women at risk for breast and ovarian cancer.

Cancer researchers say that one in 44 Ashkenazi Jews carry the mutation, while in the general population, an estimated one in 400 people carries a BRCA1 or BRCA2 mutation.

Dr. Steven Narod, the director of the familial breast cancer research unit, leads the research team that will evaluate the study. A professor at the University of Toronto's department of public health sciences, he has conducted many studies on the epidemiology of breast cancer.

Women who have had breast or ovarian cancer, or whose close relatives had, have always been able to get tested for the mutation at several sites in the city, including at the Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre and Princess Margaret Hospital. The cost is covered by OHIP.

Narod said that if this screening clinic shows that many Jewish women carry BRCA1 or BRCA2, he hopes the government will begin to cover all screening for susceptible Jewish women who have so far no indication of these cancers.

Those determined to be carriers of the mutations will receive all the "appropriate care and counselling that they require," Narod said.

Dr. Steven Narod

Since the cancer risk of those who carry the mutuations is about 80 per cent, this information is significant. Some women may choose to have prophylactic surgery, to remove their breasts and ovaries. Others might take tamoxifen, a drug that Narod has said has shown great promise in preventing the cancers. Others may opt to not do anything, particularly if they are in their childbearing years.

Those who find they are carriers of the mutation will also be able to counsel their daughters, mothers, sisters and aunts to be tested, so that they, too, can take the appropriate options.

Narod said that more than 1,000 women have already called for an appointment, so "if you want the test, you should call soon."

He said that studies dealing with these mutations are taking place all over the world – in Canada, Israel, United States, Brazil and other countries in South America. Scientists are looking to prevent breast and ovarian cancer, and to better treat it.

To be eligible for the study, you must be Jewish (Ashkenazi or Sephardi), between the ages of 25 and 80, a resident of Ontario, and not had previous testing for the BRCA1 or BRCA2 genes.

For more information, or to enrol in the study, call the familial breast cancer research unit at 416-351-3765.

Hate crime team short of funds

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A joint program of 11 Ontario police forces that collects intelligence on extremist groups is running out of money – again.

The Hate Crime Extremism Investigative Team was forced to scale down operations once its funding from the 2007-08 fiscal year ran out at the end of March, said Sgt. Don McKinnon of London Police Service. The unit has requested approximately $220,000 for the 2008-09 year, which began on April 1, but it has heard nothing from the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, said McKinnon, the unit's team leader.

In the meantime, the unit is making do. "We've been operating, but we're severely limited. We're holding on. We've been very creative in how we do our spending."

The financial shortfall facing the unit is nothing new. Three years ago, The CJN reported on a similar cash crunch when the unit's funding ran out. In 2005, the unit had been operating on a budget of $93,000 per year but its finances fell short pending approval of new funds by the minister.

McKinnon said the team's operating funds are now more or less depleted. It is in danger of shutting its phone lines, mailboxes and still must pay its civilian analyst, Abbee Corb. Corb, who tracks the activities of

Collision course

The status quo along Israel's frontier with the Gaza Strip is intolerable. As Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said last week, "We know that the situation as it is cannot continue. We are in the days of decision on this issue."

Rare is the day when an incident does not occur in which an Israeli or a Palestinian is traumatized, wounded or killed, or a building is damaged or destroyed, by the seemingly endless cycle of violence. Almost since the beginning of the second intifadah, Palestinian extremists have turned the border region into a free-fire zone, launching Qassam rockets, Grad rockets and mortars at Israeli towns – Sderot and Ashkelon – and at neighbouring kibbutzim. Since the Palestinian Authority has done virtually nothing to squelch the terrorism, Israel has hit back in legitimate self-defence. Regrettably, Israel's ground and air attacks have inadvertently claimed the lives of innocent Palestinians. Developments have gone from bad to worse since Israel's unilateral withdrawal in 2005, the seizure of Gaza a year ago this month by the terror group Hamas, and Israel's subsequent imposition of a blockade.

Realizing that the status quo is unsustainable, Israel has encouraged Egypt's envoy, Gen. Omar Suleiman, to broker a lasting ceasefire. Suleiman, the director of Egyptian intelligence and a veteran of the Yom Kippur War, has assiduously worked on the problem for the past few months, conferring with representatives from both Israel and Hamas. Egypt, which shares a border with Gaza, has a vested interest as well in achieving at least a measure of stability. Egypt has not forgotten that Hamas breached the Egyptian border last January in an attempt to end Israel's siege, which will likely be enforced until Hamas recognizes Israel's existence, renounces violence and accepts agreements that the Palestinian Authority and Israel have signed in good faith since the 1993 Oslo peace process.

Suleiman's mediation efforts, however, have so far borne no fruits because of seemingly irreconcilable differences between Israel and Hamas. Hamas wants Israel to open all border crossings immediately once a ceasefire goes into effect, but Israel insists on opening them only gradually and on condition that Gilad Shalit – a soldier kidnapped by Hamas in June 2006 – is released from captivity. Hamas hopes to extend the truce to the West Bank, but this is something that Israel is wary about because Hamas would probably exploit the lull to rebuild its infrastructure there and smuggle in new weapons. And, of course, Israel wants arms-smuggling tunnels to be shut down.

Despite his lack of progress in bridging the gaps, Suleiman continues to work on his plan. If he fails, the consequences could be deadly serious. Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak has warned that Israel is on a collision course with Hamas, and that failure to reach a truce may well force Israel to invade Gaza. According to reports, the Israeli army has preparations well in hand for an invasion. Barring one, Israel is thinking of creating a buffer zone between the Israeli and Palestinian sides of the border crossings. But if the past is any reliable guide, military solutions are not long-term answers. True, previous ceasefires have been broken and are thus hardly perfect instruments for achieving tranquillity. Yet the chance for peace is better than the misery of war. Egypt, therefore, should press on. -S.K.

Massive demonstrations, both for and against him, greeted then-Israeli cabinet minister Ariel Sharon when he came to speak in Montreal. He said Israel had soundly beaten the Palestine Liberation Organization in the Lebanon War and made its leaders realize that negotiations are the only road to peace.

Conversions retroactively annulled

The recent ruling of the haredi conversion appeals court in Israel is a very sad and troubling one indeed ("Conversion controversy rears head in Israel," CJN, May 15). In one fell swoop, a widely respected religious Zionist rabbi and his authority have been seriously undermined, and his thousands of conversions retroactively annulled.

While some may argue that the haredim are simply "raising the bar" by asserting the most stringent of halachic standards, it is widely viewed that by so doing, the haredim are imposing their political will upon the non-receptive modern Orthodox and religious Zionist communities, and all other denominations within Israel and beyond. By narrowly interpreting the halachot surrounding conversions and other matters, they are permitting very little room for legitimate differences of opinion and are rejecting more lenient and widely inclusive approaches to Jewish law.

I am afraid that further capitulation to such intolerance in Israel and in the Diaspora will only contribute to the further deterioration and ultimate dismantling of rabbinic power in Israel, a development that may be unfortunately received with all too much joy, in all too many quarters.

Withdraw support to universities

I strongly support Sally Zerker's proposal to withdraw financial support from universities and other educational institutions, such as high schools, that support Israeli Apartheid Week under the guise of protecting "free speech" ("Withdraw financial support to universities," CJN letters, May 8). But this proposal should apply not just to small donors, but to all donors, Jewish and non-Jewish, private and corporate, as well as to government support.

Given the failure of attempts at a peaceful resolution – for example, by exposing Israeli Apartheid Week's ulterior motives and requesting that the universities not allow their grounds to be used for this hate fest – I call on all peace-loving alumni to publicly withdraw their support from these institutions in favour of institutions that have shown a dedication to truth and integrity above and beyond the socio-political pressures of the day.

And to the culpable presidents of the universities at which Israeli Apartheid Week takes place, a final word: surely we do not need to point to the 1930s and '40s to underscore the profound impact of "mere" words. Surely you do not have to be reminded of the horrendous consequences of such Nazi-style incitements to hatred. And surely you are as fully aware as we are that the big lie of Israeli Apartheid Week propaganda is fuelled and financed by organizations that are driven by this very hatred – namely, anti-Semitism!

Palestinian propaganda in The CJN

With so many other media outlets spouting Palestinian propaganda and revisionism, do we really need to see it in the pages of The CJN ("Re-branding Israel, CJN letters, May 22)?

Like so many other apologists for Palestinian terror, letter writer Bernard Katz ("Re-branding Israel," CJN letters, May 22) denies Israel the right to defend itself and its citizens. In calling the security barrier "illegal," he ignores the fact that it has already saved countless lives and prevented an untold number of terror attacks – and it has done so non-violently. By accusing Israel of "[killing] innocent non-combatants", he attempts to create a moral equivalency between the Israel Defence Forces and murderous groups such Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade, ignoring the fact that when they operate in and from civilian areas, it is they and not the IDF who must bear full responsibility for Palestinian civilian casualties. By telling us that Israel "creates a living hell" for Palestinians, he excuses the corruption of Fatah and the intransigence of Hamas, both of which are the true root causes of the misery that Palestinians are forced to endure.

Katz is certainly entitled to his opinions, no matter how objectionable and despicable they may be. I just wonder why The CJN feels the need to provide him with space to air them.

Editor's note: Last week, an editorial error was made in Leonard Smith's letter ("Disagrees with letter writer," CJN letters, May 29). In the letter, a quote, attributed to Bernard Katz ("Re-branding Israel," CJN letters, May 22), should have read: "Israel must stop double dealing, stop pretending to seek peace while travelling the same old paths of dishonour, immorality and death."

Perspectives

Heschel's voice still speaks

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Spiritual Radical: Abraham Joshua Heschel in America, the second volume of Edward Kaplan's biography of Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel is well-written, thoughtful and comprehensive. It reviews the life of this towering figure of 20th century Judaism from his immigration to the United States from Europe in 1940 to his death in 1972.

The first volume, published in 1998 and co-authored with Rabbi Samuel Dresner, details the roots of this theologian who was raised in a traditional chassidic-rabbinic culture, but encouraged by his mother to study in a Polish gymnasium and to explore the secular Yiddish velt of Vilna. From Poland, the young Heschel went on to Berlin to study classical philosophy and art history at the University of Berlin. Heschel also composed Yiddish poetry, composed popular essays, initiated adult education programs, and completed a doctorate on the phenomenology of the Hebrew prophets. After the rise of Hitler, Rabbi Heschel immigrated to England in 1939 and made his way to America in 1940.

Rabbi Heschel was one of a small group of German-educated scholars saved by the heroic efforts of Rabbi Julian Morgenstern, president of Hebrew Union College (HUC) in Cincinnati. Kaplan reveals details of Rabbi Heschel's adjustment to American life, exploring his friendships and loneliness, his intellectual development and academic politics. Rabbi Heschel did not fit into the Reform rabbinical school, with its "customs and ceremonies" approach to Jewish life. With his wry sense of humour, Rabbi Heschel would refer playfully to his years in Ohio as "five years in Cin… cinnati."

While at HUC, Rabbi Heschel wrote critically about the natural theology of Albert Einstein and formally about medieval philosophy. He established contact with the academic leadership of Yeshiva University and the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS). The two centres of Jewish study were not so distant from each other at the time: just as Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, a seminal figure in modern Orthodoxy, almost taught at JTS, so, too, was Rabbi Heschel almost hired by YU. Ultimately, Rabbi Heschel came to JTS in 1945 to serve as a counterpoint to the liberal naturalistic theology of Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan.

Ironically, despite their theological differences, Rabbi Kaplan was a much warmer colleague to Rabbi Heschel than rabbis Louis Finkelstein and Louis Ginzberg, or Ginzberg's successor, Rabbi Saul Lieberman. Rabbi Heschel's focus on the spiritual, ethical and mystical elements of Judaism was outside the framework of their scholarly work, and his public profile a confirmation that he was a popular, not a serious, scholar.

By the mid-1950s, Rabbi Heschel had articulated his philosophy of religion, constructed a theology of Judaism, expressed his understanding of Jewish prayer, Shabbat and ritual, and formed his critique of American Judaism. We see how Rabbi Heschel erected the scaffolding of his thought by sensitively seeking key words to express his ideas. We can track Rabbi Heschel's effort to re-centre religious thought from the human to the divine, from the symbolic to the sanctified, and from the social to the sacred.

Rabbi Heschel served as a High Holy Day rabbi for Beth Tzedec Congregation in 1954, when the new synagogue had just been opened. Congregants were unhappy with his preaching and asked the young assistant rabbi, J. Benjamin Friedberg, to speak in place of Rabbi Heschel. Rabbi Friedberg refused to replace his teacher, and Rabbi Heschel finished the High Holy Day season.

Kaplan describes the complexity of Rabbi Heschel's personality: "courageous and shy, ambitious and humble, saintly and vain, a captivating mentor and a careless classroom teacher." In contrast to positive teaching experiences with a Shabbat afternoon study group in Cincinnati, small seminars in Chassidism at JTS, and visiting professor positions at universities, Rabbi Heschel was a diffident instructor of rabbinical students. Since Rabbi Heschel cared deeply for young people and made time for us to seek him out for counsel and advice, why was the classroom so different? Kaplan doesn't say.

In his speeches and articles, Rabbi Heschel used polarities to articulate his belief in the breadth of spiritual expression and action. What is the source of this methodology? Does it lie in chassidic and kabbalistic metaphors? Kaplan does not discuss this, either. Rabbi Heschel was a scholar who loved paradox and public confrontation. He tried to press Orthodoxy beyond what he perceived as the narrowness of "halachic man." He rebuked Reform for minimizing mitzvah. He criticized Conservative Judaism for its spiritual sclerosis. He censured secular Jews for their reduction of religion to sociology, psychology and anthropology.

Too modern for his chassidic relatives, too traditional for his Reform students, and unappreciated at JTS, Rabbi Heschel was not at home anywhere. Despite the adulation of non-Jews, Rabbi Heschel knew that Protestant seminaries were not places of Torah. He loved Israel, but did not visit so often. Theologically conservative and socially progressive, Rabbi Heschel became a public figure, despite the fact that he was bookish and a bit shy. Even at home, his pattern of observance was at variance with that of his beloved Sylvia.

Regretfully, Kaplan's book does not really disclose to us much of the private Rabbi Heschel. There were no diaries to reveal the more personal thoughts of this scholar and public intellectual. We learn little about what it was like to sit and sing with Rabbi Heschel at his Shabbat table. The interviews with students, associates and critics that are recorded are only partially revealing of Rabbi Heschel's hopes and anxieties. More importantly, the book is lacking a sense of what made Rabbi Heschel such a charismatic and powerful personality.

Kaplan, a professor of French literature at Brandeis University, has previously written with great sensitivity about Rabbi Heschel's writing style. He used alliteration, antithesis and aphorism to convey his content. Prof. Emil Fackenheim of the University of Toronto once characterized Rabbi Heschel's mode of presentation as aphoristic, descriptive and philosophico-argumentative. This style – which derived from classical midrash and chassidic rhetoric - was not one that suited academic philosophers and contributed to criticism by one well-known American-Jewish leader, who privately described Rabbi Heschel to me as "Yiddish stained glass windows." Yet it was his careful use of language, his poetic prose, that gave Rabbi Heschel's writing the lyricism that contributed to its compelling quality.

We read of the approbation from Will Herberg, Reinhold Niebuhr, Rabbi Marvin Fox, and Maurice Samuel. However, Rabbi Heschel's ideas also ignited criticism from diverse thinkers such as William Kristol, Rabbi Ira Eisenstein, Trude Weiss-Rosmarin and Rabbi Eliezer Berkovits. Was their rejection of Rabbi Heschel's theology based in a similar rejection of chassidic theology? Did anyone provide a critique of Rabbi Heschel from an overtly mitnagdic/rationalist viewpoint other than Rabbi Berkovits?

This volume also discusses the closeness Rabbi Heschel felt to the students who became his colleagues, friends and advocates. Rabbi Fritz Rothschild and Rabbi Seymour Siegel were his supporters within JTS. Rabbis Samuel Dresner and Marshall Meyer were his interpreters to the American rabbinate. Rabbis Wolfe Kelman and Marc Tanenbaum carefully presented Rabbi Heschel to the wider American scene.

We witness a transformation from the clean shaven Heszel (spelled this way on his passport to America) to a black goateed professor for his first trip to Israel in 1957. By the 1960s, Rabbi Heschel had a full white beard and a shaggy hair, giving him the image of a biblical prophet that he drew upon as he became better known. In the last decade of his life, along with the publication of theological works on the biblical prophets, rabbinic Judaism, chassidism and ethics, Rabbi Heschel began to speak more boldly about social problems as spiritual challenges. He addressed important and sensitive subjects such as civil rights for African-Americans, religious revisionism in the Catholic Church, the oppression of Soviet Jewry and the conduct of the Vietnam War. Was his concern for the larger world in the 1960s and earlier in the 1930s an outgrowth of his work on the prophets? Did it stem from his understanding of medieval philosophy as an intellectual enterprise stimulated by a spiritual quest?

Kaplan devotes close attention to Rabbi Heschel's role in the development of the papal encyclical Nostre Aetate, which declared that Jews were not responsible for the death of Jesus. We see how personal friendships and theological relationships opened doors for Rabbi Heschel to advocate for a changed understanding of Judaism and Jews in the eyes of Roman Catholicism.

In hitherto secret memoranda, Zachariah Shuster of the American Jewish Committee claimed that Rabbi Heschel overplayed his hand in a crucial audience with Pope Paul VI, almost dooming the historic opportunity for change within the Roman Catholic hierarchy. According to Shuster's account, Rabbi Heschel's sense of moral righteousness and his personal vanity endangered the negotiations at sensitive moments. This perspective, highly critical of Rabbi Heschel from a bureaucratic rival, is directly contradicted by Rabbi Heschel's own account. Shuster's description is difficult to accept, especially since Rabbi Heschel remained in close contact with the Vatican and was esteemed by leading Catholic theologians even after Nostre Aetate was issued. Among Catholic and Jewish scholars, Rabbi Heschel came to be seen as a signal figure in efforts to revise Catholic teachings about Jews and Judaism (a debate that's still in process in 2008).

Much has been written about Rabbi Heschel's last week and his presence at the Danbury Correctional Institute for the release of anti-war protester Rev. Philip Berrigan. I recall how frail Rabbi Heschel was on the Shabbat prior to his death. I escorted Sylvia and the rabbi home after the aufruf for his student, Rabbi Byron Sherwin. My wife, Josette, had made the air reservations for his flight to officiate at the wedding the following week in Chicago. I was to meet Rabbi Heschel at O'Hare Airport on Sunday morning. I'll never forget the call informing me that he had died. The many challenges presented by Rabbi Heschel's funeral on Sunday are described by Kaplan. In Chicago, the wedding of Rabbi Sherwin and Judith Schwartz went on, a mixture of the polarities of sadness and simchah.

Spiritual Radical is an excellent complement to the earlier volume, Spiritual Witness, offering a comprehensive picture of one of the most significant Jewish thinkers of the 20th century. Kaplan reveals the transitions of Rabbi Heschel from a Chassid to a European scholar to a post-Holocaust theologian who taught and embodied a vision of Torah that sought to bridge the intellectual, social and theological gaps of contemporary society. We come to see Rabbi Heschel as an exemplary individual (with flaws and foibles) whose mastery of philosophy, Kabbalah, chassidic thought and Jewish mysticism was linked to a esteem for the biblical prophets, a love for the State of Israel, and a reverence for the sanctity of all people.

Opinions

The humble hero

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Why be humble? It seems so passé. The word "humility" conjures up the medieval image of a cringing, cloistered clergyman, subsisting on bread crumbs and brackish water. This sort of self-abnegation seems out of place in the 21st century, where self-promotion and self-indulgence are the norm. Humility can only get in the way of "exercising leadership" or "promoting your personal brand."

We reject humility out of ignorance. Being humble has nothing to do with being meek or lacking self confidence. In fact, humility is the hallmark of any true hero. The humble hero doesn't aspire to glory, or even humility. He simply wants to do his job. Or, as the Mishnah puts it: "Rabban Yochanan ben Zakkai would say: 'If you have learned a great deal of Torah, don't take credit for yourself – it's for this reason that you were created.'"

This Mishnah teaches us that authentic responsibility is not pursued in order to attain glory. The truly humble live to achieve lofty goals, but make little of it. They see themselves simply as doing what is expected of them. Their attitude is that they are "just doing their job."

"I'm just doing my job" is the motto of humble heroes. Their humility is based on a work ethic that drives them to succeed in silence, content to have accomplished what life expected of them.

On May 12, Irena Sendler passed away. During World War II, Irena, a young mother and social worker, was a member of a Polish underground devoted to saving Jews. With great courage and cunning, Irena used her position to smuggle 2,500 children out of the Warsaw ghetto and hide them in orphanages.

Reading the obituaries about Irena, it's hard not to notice the differences between this humble woman and today's erstwhile heroes. Our contemporary heroes are celebrities, people who look good on baseball diamonds, movie screens and the red carpet. The "entertainment media" breathlessly follows their every move. These celluloid heroes have our undivided attention and are famous for being famous.

But a real hero doesn't look good. They do good. And after they've done good, they don't revel in self-congratulation. Rather, they think about what more they could have done. After receiving a long overdue award from Poland in 2007, Irena declared: "I could have done more… this regret will follow me to my death."

Irena is a genuine hero. Like all humble heroes, she was "just doing her job." Or, to put it in her words: "Every child saved with my help and the help of all the wonderful secret messengers, who today are no longer living, is the justification of my existence on this Earth, and not a title to glory."

I wish the justification for my existence on earth was as good as Irena's.

We could do with more Jerusalem

Gil Troy in Montreal

June 2 marked Yom Yerushalayim," celebrating the 41st anniversary of Jerusalem's reunification, achieved in June 1967. Anniversaries invite celebration and contemplation. We delight in our good fortune, while reflecting on how to deepen our relationships with individuals or guiding ideas.

There is much to celebrate, especially when we recall the situation in May 1967. For 19 years, the border between Israel and Jordan had run through the city. This jagged gash cut across the heart of the Jewish people, dividing the Old City from the new, and east Jerusalem from west.

This border was neither quiet nor peaceful. Snipers from the Jordanian side occasionally took potshots at innocent Israelis, keeping them wary whenever they glanced toward their historic Old City. Meanwhile, the Jewish community that had thrived in the Jewish Quarter for centuries was in exile. Their homes were ransacked, and 58 of their 59 synagogues were destroyed and defiled. The Mount of Olives, a Jewish cemetery in continuous use for 2,500 years, had tombstones that were wrenched off and used to build a road and the Intercontinental Hotel, where Yasser Arafat formally launched his Palestine Liberation Organization in 1964.

Contrary to some recent historians' claims, Israel had no desire to launch the broader 1967 war or conquer Jerusalem. Even after the war began, even after the Jordanians had begun shelling west Jerusalem, Israeli Prime Minister Eshkol sent Jordan's King Hussein a letter through the good offices of the United Nations general, Odd Bull, requesting peace – and warning of the risks if the Jordanians continued attacking. This gesture was not simply a hope for peace. Israel had few soldiers and minimal armaments in its capital, with little hope of repulsing a major Jordanian assault.

Israel's lightening quick and surgical victory was, therefore, all the more extraordinary. We need to remember the fragility and wonder of those times today. And we need to ask ourselves. "What does having a united Jerusalem do for us, for those living far away in Canada, the United States or elsewhere?"

Some think of Jerusalem as the great Jewish gravitational force, focusing the Jewish people throughout the years of exile – and today. As one speaker celebrating Israel's anniversary proclaimed, Israel's story "is the story of how faith guided the Jewish people through centuries of bitter exile. It is a story of how those living behind ghetto walls and barbed wire never lost sight of Jerusalem. And it is a story of how brave pioneers risked everything to redeem the promise of this land. It is a marvellous story."

Others think of Jerusalem as more of a building block of identity. A second speaker, celebrating Israel's anniversary recently marvelled: "The idea that one could hang onto one's sense of values, and have a sense of family, and despite being an outsider, somehow still have a place to come back to… Not only [to] a physical place, but also an emotional place and a spiritual place, was very powerful to me. So even before I fully understood the history of the Jewish people, the Zionist movement was something that I related to and connected to from my own experience."

The first speaker, U.S. President George W. Bush, deftly intertwined the forces of faith and history, emphasizing Judaism's uniqueness as both a religion and a nation - for a religion does not need a capital city, only a nation does. The second speaker, American Senator and presidential hopeful Barack Obama, appreciated the multiple dimensions of Jerusalem's meaning for Jews, both yesterday and today.

Together, these two tributes bring alive the words of Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harter, who said: "All of my life, Israel has been a symbol – a symbol of the triumph of hope and faith."

It's time to learn from our leaders. If these non-Jewish statesmen can find this much inspiration in our story, in our homeland, in our capital, why can't more of us? If these individuals can articulate what Jerusalem and Israel mean to them, why can't we?

We need more of this kind of depth and understanding in our lives, individually and collectively. Starting that kind of engagement is the best way to celebrate 41 years of peace and reunification. We need more Jerusalem in our lives.

On holidays, early and late

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Maybe it was the sudden burst of sunny weather that had long-buried bulbs pushing out of their beds in an explosion of bloom and colour, or the unseasonable warmth that gifted us here in Canada with a chag ha'aviv – a festival of spring – that truly felt spring-like. But over and over, people kept saying to me during the last round of festival celebration: "Ah, the holidays are late this year."

The current festival, Shavuot, it seems, will be late, as well. So far as I know, only Jews regularly comment on the premature or tardy arrival of their festival days. Other cultures seem to have better-trained holidays, as punctual and prompt as Swiss trains and computerized birthday reminders.

Ours, by contrast, are made more unruly by the interplay between lunar months and solar years. Like overeager dinner guests, our holidays catch us before we've mopped up the mess in the kitchen. Or, like party prima donnas, they make a grand entrance after the hors d'oeuvres have disappeared and the main course has dried up in the oven.

Cleaning up from the endless array of meals that are the hallmark of any Jewish celebration, I began to mull over what the appropriate rejoinder should be to remarks about the earliness or lateness of our holidays. Although Passover is long over, its accoutrements safely tucked away for next year, Shavuot is upon us, and it, too, promises to be "late." As all future major and minor festivals and fast days will be either early or late, I thought I should be prepared.

How might one respond to comments about the untimeliness of our holidays? One might offer a response that is simply informative, even pedagogic. "Yes, they're late this year, of course. It's a leap year." Or, "Early? Yes, certainly. That's why next year is a leap year."

Or one might offer the more elaborate, pedantic response. "You know, don't you, that the lunar calendar must be periodically adjusted to keep it in synch with the seasons of the solar year. The Jewish calendar works on a 19-year cycle, adding a total of seven months over the course of 19 years. Holidays are always 'late' in the third, sixth, eighth, 11th, 14th, 17th and 19th years, because that's when we add the extra month. Oh, and you must know that not every non-leap year has the same number of days, nor does every leap year have the same number of days. That's because sometimes, some months have 29 days, and sometimes these months have 30 days. The way it works is…"

By this point, before you can even get to the part about which days of the week certain holidays will never, ever, fall on, whoever made the innocent comment about the unpunctual holiday has long since disappeared, and you notice that people are staring at the person walking down the street and muttering into the air about months and days and moons and suns.

Alternatively, one might offer a statistical response, citing the number of times in a 100-year span that Pesach occurs in early and in late April, or that Shavuot occurs in May or in June. Or one might try the homiletic approach. "No, it is not the holiday that is early or late. The holiday is always on time. It is we who are too early or too late." Or the personal response: "The year I was born, the holiday was also very late." Or the perplexed response: "Why can't they just figure this holiday thing out for once and for all?" Or the frustrated response: "How can I be ready for the holiday when it comes this early?" Or the paranoid response: "They are deliberately trying to keep us off-guard." Or the feminist response: "The rabbis wanted to keep women in the kitchen." Or the Zen response: "Whenever it is, there it is."

As a literature professor, I'm partial to the metaphorical approach. This perennial tussle of riptides and solar squalls, this managed chaos that comes of dancing in the moonlight and singing in the sunshine to separate rhythms, this tension of ordering the ebb and flow of our lives according to celestial bodies that have their own distinct and different orbits – isn't this the stuff of our lives? Isn't it, after all, the blessing of creation?

The Kirshner File

Peace would be good for both Israel and Syria

The momentous news that Israel and Syria have laid the groundwork for a resumption of peace negotiations was surprising yet expected. In a joint statement issued on May 21, Israel and Syria disclosed that their representatives in Istanbul had conducted three days of secret indirect talks through Turkey. The two sides said that they had conducted a "dialogue in a serious and continuous manner" in a concerted effort to reach a comprehensive peace accord, and that they would meet again soon.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert described the meetings as a historical breakthrough, while Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem said that Damascus had agreed to revive the talks after receiving firm assurances from Israel, via Turkey, that Israel was willing to make a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights and thus restore the pre-1967 border.

Last week, Turkish Foreign Minister Ali Babacan noted that talks may be upgraded to face-to-face encounters should "meaningful and concrete developments" take place in the near future. Babican's upbeat assessment caught many Israelis by surprise, given the accumulation of tensions between Israel and Syria in the past year.

Walid Moallem

Last April, nine months after the eruption of the Second Lebanon War, during which the Syrian-backed Lebanese militia Hezbollah bombarded Israel with nearly 4,000 rockets, the Israeli army held widely publicized training manoeuvres, supposedly in anticipation of an offensive by Syria to recapture the Golan. Syrian officials, from President Bashar Assad on down, had asserted that Syria was intent on regaining the Golan by means of diplomacy or war.

On Sept. 6, 2007, Israel turned up the heat by at least several notches when Israeli combat jets bombed a Syrian military site near Turkey. Not since October 2003 had Israel sent warplanes into Syria. Israel's air raid occurred shortly after a Palestinian suicide bomber linked to Islamic Jihad – supported by Syria – killed 21 Israelis in a Haifa restaurant, in one of the worst such incidents of its kind since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

In a show of force meant as a warning to Damascus, Israel bombed a disused Palestinian base in Syria and acknowledged its deed. But after destroying Syria's North Korean-designed nuclear reactor, Israel remained conspicuously silent, refusing to take responsibility for the raid. Syria was embarrassed by the bombing, having failed to inform the International Atomic Energy Agency about its clandestine nuclear project. Syria, nevertheless, played it cool, insisting that Israel had merely hit an empty base. Israel did not press the point, unwilling to further antagonize the prickly Syrians.

Five months later, tensions boiled over yet again when Imad Mughniyah, the deputy secretary of Hezbollah, was gunned down in Damascus by unknown assailants. Speaking for Syria, parliamentarian Mohammed Habash claimed that Israel and its "Zionist agents" had carried out the killing. The Israeli government denied complicity, yet Israel had a sufficient reason to eliminate Mughniyah, one of the masterminds of the bombing of the Israeli Embassy and the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in 1992 and 1994 respectively.

Amid the rising tension, Israel and Syria were reaching out to each other in a bid to jump-start negotiations. Talks began in 1991 after the Madrid peace conference, broke off in 1996 after a succession of Palestinian suicide bombings that killed 60 Israelis within a period of about a week, resumed in 1999 in Shepherdstown, W. Va., under American auspices, and collapsed again in March 2000 following an unsuccessful meeting between the presidents of the United States and Syria, Bill Clinton and Hafez Assad, Bashar Assad's father.

Three years after his father's untimely death in June 2000, Assad told the New York Times that he was ready to resume talks with Israel. By Syria's count, 85 per cent of the issues had already been settled in previous rounds.

The Israeli prime minister of the day, Ariel Sharon, was loathe to relinquish the Golan, a strategic plateau captured by Israel in the Six Day War and now populated by some 18,000 Jewish settlers. Sharon said that new talks could not be launched unless Syria ended its armed presence in Lebanon, permitted the Lebanese army to patrol the Israeli frontier and closed the Damascus offices of such Palestinian radical group as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Sharon, determined to keep the Golan at all costs, knew that the Syrians would not accept his conditions, and he was right. Talks never materialized.

Recep Tayyip Erdogan

In the winter of 2007, however, Olmert conferred with Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan in Istanbul, informing him that Israel was now prepared to sound out Syrian intentions. Previously, Olmert had expressed a vague interest in engaging Syria,

The benefits of a peace treaty with Syria are clear, even though U.S. President George W. Bush seems more intent on isolating Syria in punishment for its meddling in Lebanon and its implicit support of insurgents in Iraq.

For Israel, a rapprochement with Syria would be highly beneficial. Israel's existence and its place in the Middle East would be recognized by Syria, one of its most implacable enemies. And, of course, Syria could be a lucrative market for Israeli exports.

Recognition of Israel by other Arab League nations would eventually be forthcoming, and the Palestinians would be pressured to settle their conflict with Israel. Syria could be decoupled from the Arab rejectionist camp, possibly forcing it to downgrade its alliance with Iran, Israel's most dangerous foe today.

In addition, Syria could be weaned away from its active sponsorship of Hezbollah and Palestinian extremist organizations.

Syria would benefit as well. Syria would regain the Golan, thereby burnishing Assad's image and reinforcing his grip on the country. Syria's relationship with the United States and the European Union would undergo a sea change, much to the advantage of its creaky and anemic economy.

Once Israel and Syria were committed to using the Turkish back channel, they entered a new phase in their often hostile relationship, and the signs were unmistakable.

Last November, on the eve of renewing talks with the Palestinians in Annapolis, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak – a seasoned veteran of the Syrian track – said that Israel should seriously consider opening negotiations with Syria.

In January 2008, the Syrian foreign minister declared that Syria was not seeking a military solution to its dispute with Israel and was primed for a fresh round of negotiations. In February, Alon Liel, the former director-general of Israel's foreign ministry, met Syria's ambassador to the United States, Imad Mustafa, and heard that Assad wanted to restart discussions. Jimmy Carter, the ex-U.S. president, reported two months ago that Assad was "eager" to deal with Israel.

Shortly afterward, a Syrian cabinet minister, Buthama Shaaban, officially broke the silence. She said that Olmert had indeed sent a message to Assad to the effect that Israel was ready to cede the Golan in exchange for peace. As if to confirm her comment, Olmert, in an interview with Yediot Aharonot, said, "I am very interested in a peace process with Syria." Ironically, Olmert may not be around to taste the fruits of his efforts to defuse Israel's six-decade-old conflict with Syria. Embroiled in a corruption scandal of the first magnitude, he may well lose his position as prime minister long before Israel and Syria ever get down to the business of fleshing out the terms of a historic peace treaty.

Kensington designated a historic site

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Several hundred people attended a ceremony in the Kensington Market area on May 25, as a plaque was unveiled designating the once-Jewish neighbourhood in downtown Toronto as a national historic site.

The event was sponsored by Parks Canada and included speeches by Jason Kenney, secretary of state for multiculturalism and Canadian identity, Toronto Mayor David Miller, and representatives of several ethnic communities.

Representing the Jewish community were David Koschitzky, chair of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Ellen Scheinberg, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, both of whom made short addresses from a flag-draped podium in Bellevue Square, just steps from the old Kiever Synagogue.

Kensington Market was an important staging ground for English and Irish working-class immigrants in the mid-to-late 19th century. A second wave of Jewish immigrants arrived between 1905 and 1930 and established the market and family-owned shops that defined the neighbourhood's character. Waves of Portuguese, Chinese, South Asians, Afro-Caribbeans and other immigrants added new flavour and colour in the postwar era.

The government's recognition of the neighbourhood "will ensure that the important history of this district will be appreciated for generations to come," Kenney said.

Parks Canada arranged for both klezmer music and cake following the ceremony. Hermes Bakery provided a large kosher cake decorated with a neighbourhood map and depictions of the area's many Victorian houses, streetscapes and distinctive buildings, including the Kiever and Minsker synagogues.

"The professionals who worked with us from Parks Canada – they were fabulous, by the way – wanted a cake for 400 people, and it was gone by the end of the event," said Cyrel Troster, a board member of the Ontario Jewish Archives, which gives occasional guided tours of the Spadina area, some hosted by Troster herself.

The plaque unveiled at the event will be permanently installed in Bellevue Square shortly. A second plaque, featuring the same illustrations as on the cake, is to follow within several months.

Beside two nearby park benches, a life-size statue of the late Al Waxman, star of the King of Kensington television show, seemed to smile approvingly at the proceedings, happy that his childhood domain was getting more of the recognition it so richly deserves.

hate groups on the Internet, is responsible for maintaining the team's database, which boasts 6,000 files, reports, photographs and other documents. The database is accessible to hate crimes and intelligence services of the 11 participating police forces as well as the RCMP and CSIS, said McKinnon. Police units in Toronto, London, Waterloo Region, Hamilton, York Region, Ottawa and Guelph are among the team members.

McKinnon said the program is a valuable tool used by police to gather intelligence and prevent hate crimes. If police attend hate marches or other events, they could nip in the bud any trouble that might occur, he said.

The unit has added an educational component to its work, he continued. It has produced three training videos on hate crimes distributed to frontline police officers, to community groups and to Crown attorneys and judges.

McKinnon said funding shortfalls have occurred in the last few years, though in the end the province came through with support. "It's always been last second funding," he said.

Tony Brown, a spokesperson for the ministry, said more than $726,000 has been provided to the police unit since funding began in 2003. "We have received a funding proposal and we are in the process of reviewing it," he said.

Brown said the unit's grants are reviewed annually. He would not give a timeline for a decision on the current funding request.

Associated celebrates its 100th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto celebrates its 100th anniversary June 11 with a birthday bash at its Hurwich branch, one of a series of events this year that will culminate in a gala centennial dinner in November.

"One hundred years of Associated equals 100 years of Jewish education in Toronto," said Deena Nathanson-Gauze, a historian by training and an AHS parent who is compiling material for a collectible book on the school's history.

Before the school, which now serves 2,000 students on three campuses, first opened its doors in downtown Toronto, local Jewish families relied on private teachers to give their children a Jewish education.

Associated, which started its day school in the mid-1940s, has the same mission and philosophy as it did 100 years ago, Nathanson-Gauze said. The school has always been open to everyone in the community regardless of socio-economic status or level of Jewish observance, a notion that was innovative at the time, she added.

But a ledger from the school's early days reflects at least one aspect of life that has changed, said Nathanson-Gauze, who is also serving as archivist for the centennial project.

The ledger, dating back to the 1920s and 1930s, includes reasons for students' absences. "Some of [the students] had to go to work after school," she said. "These were children of immigrant families, and it was the Depression."

The school's "ladies' auxiliary," a precursor of today's parents' association, played a role that is still familiar today, fundraising for the school and its activities. However, Nathanson-Gauze noted, the group also ensured that children from financially strapped families had clothes and even shoes.

Probably the oldest artifact she has is a copy of a High Holy Day speech from the school's earliest days that was read from local pulpits, exhorting parents to send their children to the fledgling school.

"There are all sorts of wonderful things," Nathanson-Gauze said. She noted in particular an engraved silver trowel used at several groundbreaking ceremonies and dating back to the mid-1920s, when the school opened its building on Brunswick Avenue.

Nathanson-Gauze said she would welcome additional contributions – things like older photos, school projects and pictures of group activities like the annual Israel walk – which can be made through any branch of the school.

By the time Mark Smiley, the AHS director of education, was a student at the school in the 1960s and early 1970s, Associated was a fixture in the Toronto Jewish community at its then sole location on Neptune Drive.

Smiley recalls "wonderful Shabbatons" in grades 7 and 8, which he says are still a positive feature of the school.

But he also remembers, with what seems to be a mix of regret and nostalgia, the pranks his class used to pull.

"I'll be honest. Part of my success in the United States was knowing what we used to get away with here, and being a couple of steps ahead of the children," Smiley said of the early part of his career in Jewish education before he returned to Toronto.

"I happen to have an advanced degree in spitball shooting," he quipped.

However, he noted, school alumni have gone on to distinguish themselves in a diverse array of fields.

At least three other graduates head Jewish schools in other cities, and alumni can be found on university faculties, in research labs, in the legal field and in the film industry, he said. The school also has writers and rabbis, said Smiley, who was himself ordained by the Conservative movement last year.

The biggest difference at Associated today, Smiley said, is that "the school has fully embraced best practices in both Jewish and general education… [regarding] teaching and learning, technology, special needs and finding high level Judaic leaders."

As for the future, "the field of education never stops evolving," Smiley said. "I think if you allow yourself to stand still, you're going to fall behind."

Annex Shul group gives back to community

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

In March 2007, Jonathan Polak was going through a difficult time in both his personal and professional lives.

Then Passover came along.

"It was a break in my life," Polak, 26, said. "I found myself completely surrounded by commotion and noise. I enjoyed that day, and I thought this should be the last time I enjoy my family by myself."

Polak, an active member of the Annex Shul, decided to bring that joy to the Jewish community by setting up a volunteer group for young students and professionals.

Along with his family and more than 20 volunteers, Polak organized the group's first event this past Passover at the L'Chaim Retirement Home, on Sheppard Avenue West.

"When we arrived, no one was saying anything or moving, but as people started coming, the atmosphere changed," he said.

The seder, held on the second day of Passover, brought together a variety of people from different religious backgrounds.

"Some of the secular Jews had nowhere to go for the seder. A lot of people haven't been to a real seder before. The event wasn't [just] religious. The purpose was to help people. We all have an interest in helping a disadvantaged group," Polak said.

While many volunteers were from the Annex shul, some came from as far as Waterloo. Others didn't belong to any shul.

"One girl who has never come out is now joining the Annex Shul for services," Polak said.

Rabbi Aaron Levy of the Annex Shul sees this group as a positive opportunity for the community.

"It's a fantastic initiative. It's an opportunity for young adults to bring joy to others," he said.

Polak will continue planning events and is in the process of organizing one for Shavuot. It will be held at the Wolfond Centre at the University of Toronto, in partnership with Reena.

Elana Metter, one of the volunteers, sees the group as an inexpensive way to give back to the community.

"A lot of ways to volunteer are cost prohibitive," she said. "For this, you're just giving your time. Everyone can give time."

Metter also enjoyed the variety of people who came out.

"It covered a broad spectrum," she said. "I like having people with different Jewish backgrounds there. You get a richer experience."

Through his new group, Polak is trying to create links in the Jewish community.

"There's a stratification of Jews. They tend to be friends with [people]from the same backgrounds. I'd like to see groups intermingle more."

Polak, who was born in Paraguay, has spent time in China, where he became involved in Shanghai's Jewish community.

He said there's a difference between that community and Toronto's.

"In Toronto, synagogues are not focal points. In China, [Judaism] is a societal religion. It's about people coming together. Here, we don't reach out. I'd like to see places of worship become more of a community."

Polak hopes his group will help create some of the connections he saw in China.

"In Shanghai, there is a small Jewish community. In Toronto, there isn't really a community. It's harder to live in China – the poverty is so powerful, the suffering is great and the compassion is so little. But having that community there [gives you] a sense of Judaism."

Polak said he experienced a unique sense of social bonding in China.

"There was one Israeli there that had a wine importing company. He had money troubles, and people in the community [raised] money for him. He was taken care of. I don't know if that would happen here. That's how Judaism should be."

Raviv Israel, one of the group's co-organizers, sees it as an opportunity to learn about different Jewish communities.

"It helps people connect. There's Judaism in different countries," said Israel, who was born in India.

"It's important that people know that there are Jews in India. A lot of people aren't aware of that. [Groups like this] help expose them to that, especially if you have people from India or China. People asked me a lot of questions at the event, but that's good. I'm all for that."

Israel hopes the group will expand.

"We were [at the seder] for a couple of hours. After that, life goes on. It made Passover better, but it wasn't life changing. In the future, I want us to establish ourselves. Hopefully we'll look into ongoing events," he said.

Metter wants to continue volunteering with Polak's group.

"I said I'd help his mother cook for the next event," she said. "I hope it grows but it's too early to say. Grassroots groups [like this one] start small, but they have the potential to grow."

Syria's motivations for talks spurs debate

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The recent revelation that Israel had begun indirect peace negotiations with Syria brought a flurry of media analysis, including an opinion piece in the Globe and Mail by Michael Bell, a former Canadian ambassador to (at different times) Egypt, Jordan and Israel ("A conversion on the road to Damascus?" May 27).

Bell rejected the view of some that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was trying to distract attention from the corruption scandal he's currently embroiled in. Instead, Bell praised Olmert for having "displayed courage and foresight in committing to negotiations."

Bell wrote: "With the threat of Islamic radicalization rife in the region, Mr. Olmert realizes it's in Israel's most basic interest to make substantial concessions for peace, including it seems, the return of territory to Syria," namely, the Golan Heights.

But what about Syria's concessions to Israel? Bell's answer is twofold: First, Syria would rein in Hezbollah in Lebanon, and second, Iran, by losing its only Arab ally, Syria, would suffer a serious blow to its regional ambitions, including its support of Hamas.

In fact, according to Bell, if Israeli-Syrian negotiations succeed, "the so-called Shia crescent, linking Iran, through Iraq, to Syria and Lebanon, could well crumble."

This sanguine view doesn't explain why, apart from getting the Golan Heights back, Syria would be willing to give up its radicalism, including its close, long-standing relationship with Tehran. Beyond relinquishing its support for extremists operating against Israel, would Damascus be prepared to offer Israel full peace?

Bell acknowledges that, currently, a majority of skeptical Israelis oppose negotiations with Syria. They see the Golan Heights as too valuable a strategic asset and do not trust Syria. Bell, however, notes that according to "many in Israeli military intelligence," in a missile age, "withdrawal from the Golan with appropriate guarantees of demilitarization, would enhance, not imperil, security."

There is a debate in Israel on all these points. Barry Rubin, author most recently of the book The Truth About Syria, takes a very skeptical view about Syria's interest in peace with Israel. In his May 25 Jerusalem Post column, headlined "The Syrian talks aren't serious," he wrote that "the idea that Syria wants real peace, will recognize Israel, move away from Iran, abandon Hamas or Hezbollah, and cease terrorist meddling in Iraq is the purest nonsense. All these steps are against the regime's vital interests. Yet... it can play the talks game without doing any of these things."

Last month, it was announced (including by cbc.ca) that Tony Burman, CBC News' editor-in-chief for the last seven of his 35-years with the network, would join Al-Jazeera English as the managing director. His appointment follows that of Avi Lewis, a former CBC host, who joined the network's Washington bureau in February.

Meanwhile, David Marash, a veteran American correspondent and substitute host for ABC's Nightline, quit his job as Washington anchor for Al-Jazeera English in March. Marash said he could no longer tolerate the network's anti-American bias and increasing editorial control from its Doha headquarters, mostly at the hands of its British administrators.

Tony Burman

A May 15 National Post report, "Burman to head Al-Jazeera station," cited a Guardian newspaper interview in which Burman said he would "put an emphasis on the expansion of Al-Jazeera's vast audience reach into important new areas of the world, most notably North America."

Al-Jazeera English was launched in November 2006 and has an estimated audience of 110 million viewers worldwide. However, Bruce DeMara, in his Toronto Star story on Burman's appointment ("Ex-CBC editor joins Al-Jazeera," May 15), wrote that the network is not available in Canada and the United States. (In fact it's mostly unavailable – it's carried by a very small number of local U.S. cable outlets, but no Canadian cable companies offer it.)

Burman, now based in Doha, told DeMara that this lack of access "is something we're all determined and hopeful will change, because I think Canadians, particularly Canadians, would respond incredibly well to the richness and range of Al-Jazeera's programming."

DeMara explained that while Al-Jazeera has received "tentative regulatory approval" in Canada, "cable companies have not applied to carry its signal because of onerous monitoring requirements aimed at preventing the spread of anti-Semitic and anti-Israel bias."

Jewish Life

This, too, is Torah

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

Reb Haim Brisker, the grandfather of the distinguished scholar and teacher, Rabbi Joseph Ber Soloveitchik, was recognized as a gaon, a genius and luminary who was respected by the entire European Jewish community. He was also a very special individual who had great concern for the needs of every Jew.

Occasionally, Reb Haim was confronted with the problem of children who were born out of wedlock. Sometimes a girl who was unmarried and pregnant would come to him and fearfully reveal her secret. Reb Haim would comfort the girl and tell her to bring him the baby when it was born, and he would find a good home for child.

Sometimes such babies were left on his doorstep without the mother identifying herself, and Reb Haim would make certain that the baby was placed with a good family. Before the baby was placed in a home, Reb Haim would arrange for a wet nurse to take care of it.

Once, a nurse Reb Haim had hired came to his home and demanded her pay for taking care of the child. Reb Haim, who had very little money because he was always sharing it with people in need, apologized, and asked if she would come back the next day when he would pay her. But the woman was insistent. She was not to be mollified. The woman became very angry. She shouted at Reb Haim: "If the rabbi wants to raise a mamzer [illegitimate child], then let him have the money ready. I am not leaving until I get my money."

Reb Haim excused himself and went into a nearby room where the beit din was adjudicating cases. He approached one of the judges and asked if he could borrow some money. For Reb Haim, of course, the request was granted. Reb Haim went to the nurse and paid her. Then he spoke softly, but firmly, to her.

"I want to make two requests of you. When you go home, please wait about an hour before you nurse the child. I am concerned as you are quite angry. And perhaps, in such a state, your milk may harm the child. And I have a second request. Please take good care of this child. Consider him to be a good and pure child. Please do not consider him to be a mamzer. What his parents might have done is no fault of his."

The Talmud informs us that the great sage Rabbi Akiva once noted that he followed his teacher, Rabbi Yehoshua, into the washroom and learned three things about personal care from him. One of his colleagues, Ben Azzai, rebuked Rabbi Akiva for acting in such an unseemly and disrespectful fashion toward his teacher. Rabbi Akiva replied to him: "This, too, is Torah, and I needed to learn it."

In a few days, we will be celebrating the Festival of Shavuot, the commemoration of the giving of the Ten Commandments to Moses and the children of Israel by God upon Mount Sinai. It is a time to celebrate and to reflect upon Torah and its meaning for the Jewish people. I submit that Torah is more than that found in the printed volumes of Tanach, Talmud, midrash, and codes that we study. It also includes the actions of those who study and live their lives by its teachings. It includes how these individuals comport themselves in their daily lives. It includes how they interact with colleagues and community leaders. And, in particular, it includes, how they interact with abandoned infants and wet nurses.

To paraphrase Rabbi Akiva, this, too, is Torah and we need to learn it.

Rabbi Mark Friedman is the rabbi of the Castel Royale Senior Residence in Montreal.

The end of the Bronze Age

By ALEX GROPPER

The Bronze Age (circa 3100-1200 BCE) was a major milestone in human achievement.

It saw the birth of civilization in the ancient world, especially in the Near and Middle East, where the great hydraulic, or river valley, civilizations of Mesopotamia and Egypt were born. Both of these civilizations would have a major impact on ancient Israel.

The Bible tells us that Abraham came from Ur, which was originally equated with the great Sumerian city. Ur was dug up by English archeologist Sir Leonard Wooley in the 1920s and '30s. However, some now believe that the "Ur" Abraham came from was not the monumental Sumerian city that reached its zenith in the late third millennium BCE, but rather another "Ur," in the area of northern Syria and southern Turkey.

John Van Seters, formerly a professor at the University of Toronto, came up with the controversial theory that the patriarchal stories of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, with their wanderings back and forth to Haran, also in southeastern Turkey, reflects the period of the exile of the "10 Lost Tribes." Archeological evidence indicates that people with Israelite names turned up in the period after 722 BCE, when the Assyrians had destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel and carried off some of its people into captivity.

This dating of the Patriarchs well into the first millennium BCE is at least 1,000 years later than that proposed by the legendary W.F. Albright and his disciples. Finding a proper historical time for the Patriarchs has consumed biblical scholars and archeologists for a quite a while. Two eminent Israeli scholars, Benjamin Mazar and Avraham Malamat, preferred a later date than the one proposed by Albright. They believed the patriarchal period should be intermediate to Albright's and Van Seter's dating.

Their dating would explain such anachronisms in the patriarchal stories as camels, which were not domesticated until the end of the second millennium BCE, as well as the mention of the Philistines, who were not around until the end of the Bronze Age and the beginning of the Iron Age, sometime around 1200 BCE.

This was a tumultuous time in the history of civilization in which the Philistines played a role. It saw the disintegration of the old order in the eastern Mediterranean, which James Henry Breasted, the founder of the Oriental Institute at the University of Chicago, had called the First International Period. A number of prominent civilizations collapsed or were permanently weakened. Among these were the Hittites, in Asia Minor, and the Egyptians, as well as the Mycenaeans, in the Aegean region. This was also the period in which many scholars place the Trojan War. Coincidentally, it is also the time in which many biblical scholars would place the Exodus.

It is amazing that two of the seminal events in the history of western civilization occurred at the same time. The Trojan War is crucial to the birth of Greek civilization, while the Exodus and the theophany at Sinai play a pivotal role in the birth of Israel and its faith.

I have often wondered whether it is coincidental that these twin pillars of western civilization occurred at roughly the same time and what this means. What appears certain is that these two events were part of the upheaval around the death of the Bronze Age and the birth of the Iron Age.

Both of these events – the Trojan War and the Exodus and the theophany at Sinai – would play a major role in the development of their respective cultures, but they would also as an inspiration to others. The experience of the Hebrew slavery and bondage in Egypt would be a touchstone for blacks in America, where it would be lamented in spirituals and used for inspiration in Martin Luther King's classic, "I have a dream" speech. Once more the Past would come Forward to inspire the future.

With Torah, the journey is the goal

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The holiday of Shavuot has arrived again this year, and, as always, we gather to celebrate the giving and receiving of the Torah.

It's customary to stay awake and study all night. Anyone who has participated in these all-night study events knows that the wisdom of Torah truths in the middle of the night contain a different flavour than they do during the daytime. Rabbi Jose is quoted in the Zohar as stating that Torah is clearer at night, for the oral Torah belongs to the night. But the nighttime is not only unique in the context of study. It's also a very intimate time for us. Husbands and wives seek each other in their own unique ways once they are secluded in the depths of the night.

Just as true lovers can never be satisfied with each other but will always search for more, the Midrash tells us that the one who loves Torah can never gain satisfaction of learning but will always seek more. Our engagement with the words and truths of Torah touch us intimately.

Our love of Torah is not time-bound, nor can it be measured. The school of Rabbi Ishmael taught that the obligation to study Torah is not like a normal debt, where one could discharge the debt by paying the owed amount. On the contrary, according to Rabbi Ishmael, we are duty bound to Torah in a way that no person has the authority to release themselves. We are not the masters of our love.

Yet if we are not masters of this relationship, and we are never fully satisfied but are always yearning for more, and if it's an unending, ongoing search, why would anyone begin?

To answer this question, we must challenge our modern orientation of assessing every task by its end goal.

With most of the initiatives we undertake today, we envision a goal at the end and outline the steps we need to take to get there. Being goal-directed, we reassess and navigate along the way, always reorienting ourselves toward the goal.

With Torah, the goal is the journey itself – our reference points are redefined.

God approaches Abraham and Sarah in Genesis and tells them to "lech lecha," take a journey. God identifies the goal as "a place I will show you." When God instructs Moses to lead Israel in building a Tabernacle, a place of spiritual expression, the instructions begin with the innermost part, and there is no initial vision of a finished product. Activating the teachings of Torah is the goal, and the Torah itself is the beginning.

The Sages of Pirkei Avot are aware of this unending process and clearly teach us that it's not our duty to complete the work, but also that this does not free us from the obligation to engage in it.

Clearly any tools we can bring to the task would be invaluable. In the introduction to the Geonic work Halachot Gedolot, it states that kindness spoke to Torah and said, "You are beautiful only if I beautify you. You are like a beautiful woman who needs a handmaid to guard over her beauty."

Torah is the journey, intimacy with God is the goal and kindness is the tool.

Shavuot foods

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

From cholent to chicken soup, much of the Jewish gastronomic year seems to revolve around meat and poultry. But with the longer days and warmer temperatures of the Shavuot season, our palates turn to dairy foods. Today, some of the finest kosher dairy recipes on the web.

Shavuot is best known for the giving of the Torah, so why the association with dairy foods? Virtual Jerusalem lists seven reasons. Two of the most famous: On Shavuot, the Jewish people received a new code of law, including the dietary restrictions that became part of their daily life. Since the new laws of separating meat and milk were still unclear, only dairy products were eaten on Shavuot to avoid transgressing the unfamiliar laws. Another reason: the Torah is compared to milk, as it is written: "Sweetness drops/ From your lips, O bride; honey and milk/ Are under your tongue." (Song of Songs, 4:11). [tinyurl.com/6rph9k]

Let's start with some of the dairy classics. The Jewish-Food Blintz Archives has three-dozen variations including Asparagus and Cheese, Elaine's Bubbe's and Henny Youngman's. (Take his blintz, please?) [tinyurl.com/5b68qg]

As for the other holiday staples, when I last checked, I found 16 cheesecake and 24 varieties of kugel at the RFCJ Recipe Archives. If you want to be more adventurous, check out this site's large Shavuot recipe archives where you'll find out how to prepare Goat Cheese and Scallion Kugel, Carrot Vichyssoise with Orange Nectar and some good old Montreal Cheese Bagels. [tinyurl.com/2cyn7]

Jewish Heritage Online Magazine has a lovely article that focuses on some lesser-known Shavuot foods. "Jewish women in Oriental countries took pride in baking for Shavuot a seven-layer cake called Siete Cielos (Seven Heavens), symbolic of the traditional seven celestial spheres God traversed to present the Torah to Moses on Mount Sinai… Jews of Kurdistan prepare large quantities of butter and cheese for the festival. Their special dish was ground wheat cooked in sour milk with dumplings of butter and flour." [tinyurl.com/5egmjs]

Food writer Sybil Kaplan continues the international survey. "Because the Yemenite Jews from southern Arabia do not consider themselves a part of either the Ashkenazim or Sephardim, they do not eat dairy foods on Shavuot and presume the children of Israel knew about kashrut while waiting for Moses… They eat meat and pita or traditional Shabbat foods with their condiments – schug, the paste made with red peppers and spices; and hilbe, a paste made with fenugreek seeds." Syrian Jews eat "Atayef, a filled cheese pancake, and ruz ib asal, a baked rice pudding with honey and rose water, [they are] are traditional for Shavuot." [tinyurl.com/5uksba]

Having a Jewish holiday focused on dairy may seem liberating but not so if milk products make you ill. Merrell Candace Mastin is lactose intolerant and wanted to know how she should celebrate the holiday. The Aish HaTorah rabbi put it into perspective: "When all is said and done, eating dairy on Shavuot is only a custom, whereas 'enjoying Yom Tov' has the status of Torah law. So when the two ideas conflict, as in your case, it is better to preserve your enjoyment of the Shavuot holiday and not eat dairy. Of course, you could try soy milk as a substitute." [tinyurl.com/5ado9b] Or you can try a few of the 1,000 pareve recipes at the OU site. [tinyurl.com/475ucu]

For some people, sitting down to a Shavuot meal means eating both dairy and meat – with an appropriate pause between them. If you want to try this, first listen to Rabbi Dovid Bendory as he explains the source of this custom and the details for performing it. [tinyurl.com/4d76us]

Finally, if someone you know loves cheesecake but lives far away, you still can mail them a piece – via e-mail. Just go to Virtual Jerusalem, where you can send off an electronic postcard with a delicious photo of a virtual cheesecake along with a virtual blintz and virtual bourekas. Sure, they'll never compare to the real thing. But at least the calories are virtual, too. [tinyurl.com/6pz4yz]

Pre-schoolers run mini-marathon for charity

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Sixty children aged two to six ran a half-kilometre track May 21 in a mini-marathon that raised more than $7,000 for their school – Torah Tots – and to help others.

In addition to Torah Tots preschool in Thornhill, the funds will go to the Zareinu Educational Centre and Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children. The kids were the youngest participants in Canada to take part in Kilometres for Kids, an event sponsored and run by the non-profit organization Crafting for a Cure, which was created to raise money for the Hospital for Sick Children, specifically the pulmonary department.

Zareinu, a Jewish day school and treatment centre, provides special education and individualized therapies to children with developmental challenges.

Crafting for a Cure's Creating Breathing Space is a foundation whose mandate is to redesign the playrooms at SickKids and to raise money to find a cure for chronic lung disease.

Under its president, Pamela Bielak, Crafting for a Cure has donated crafts for children in the emergency rooms at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto and the Royal University Hospital in Saskatoon.

Bielak's son Daniel, the catalyst that led to the formation of the charity, has a rare form of asthma and is allergic to puffers. His immune system rejects medication, and his condition is so rare that doctors do not have a name for it yet, Bielak said. The Bielaks found emergency rooms didn't have enough play items for children and set out to change that.

Six-year-old Amanda Gawza of Torah Tots' senior kindergarten donated her tooth fairy money to "help a little boy breathe." Her mother, Naomi, noted how seriously her daughter took the mission.

"She called all of her relatives and emptied out her piggy bank. She told people, 'I need at least $10, but you can give more if you want to.'"

Touched by her daughter's enthusiasm, she asked Amanda if she realized that was the same amount of money to buy a Hanna Montana DVD. Her response was, "I still want to give it to the boy to help him."

At the fundraiser, Doo Doo the Clown, Toronto Argonaut Andrew Durie and YTV host Tonya Harper helped add to the fun for the kids. The event at Torah Tots was also sponsored by CTV, the Toronto Argonauts, Starbucks, Nascar Speedpark, Farco Entertainment, Creativ Festival, and Dare.

Durie has a special connection to the work that Zareinu does. His son, six-year-old Malcolm, has autism. "I just had to come to show support. I know how scarce funding is. Anything I could do to help, I wanted to be a part of."

Bielak credits the idea for these marathons to Josh Hoffman of Charlton Public School in Thornhill. His bar mitzvah project in 2003 was to raise money for his school and for the Hospital for Sick Children. Since then, under Bielak's leadership, Kilometres For Kids has had more than 5,000 participants in the GTA and 450 in Saskatoon.

Torah Tots, which is run by Chabad Lubavitch, teamed up with Crafting for a Cure in January, when Bielak became acquainted with Torah Tots' preschool director Goldie Plotkin.

"For us, it was an amazing breakthrough to the Jewish community. Hopefully more Jewish schools will follow suit," Bielak said.

LAG B'OMER BASH: Close to 800 people enjoyed an Israeli-style Lag b'Omer celebration on May 22 in G. Ross Lord Park, hosted by the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre and the "Israeli House." It featured a clown act, bouncing castles, a barbecue, live music and an enormous bonfire.

TV show gives kosher restaurant a makeover

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Following Joe Boo's Cookoos recent restaurant makeover, owner Joe Boussidan says his restaurant finally looks as good as his food tastes.

The kosher chicken restaurant, located at Chabad Gate and Bathurst Street in Thornhill, Ont., was recently done over by Food Network Canada's Restaurant Makeover, a show whose challenge is to renovate, revamp and relaunch local restaurants.

Joe Boussidan watches over his chickens in his renovated restaurant.

"My food has always been delicious, but the décor was Home Depot gone wrong. It looked like we built it from extras in our garage," said Boussidan, a 45-year-old father of seven who started Joe Boo's about four years ago.

A former caterer at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, Boussidan, a native of Morocco, opened Cookoos with the goal of "serving the best food that just happened to be kosher."

He scoured the market for about 1½ years before opening, he said, and finally came upon a rotisserie manufactured in Seattle, Wash., that cooked chicken solely with the heat of burning logs.

He travelled to Seattle with three kosher chickens and cooked them using a brand-new oven so the chickens would remain kosher.

"After four hours, I took them out and tasted them. They were juicy, but nothing special. However, two hours later in my hotel room, the aroma of the wood surrounded me. I was overwhelmed by the delicious smell and immediately knew that people would love it. I was convinced."

Once in business, though, he found that customers were mostly buying his chicken wings, hamburgers and steak sandwiches.

"The wood-burned chicken was a sleeper. Then I perfected the roasting and seasoning.

"One Friday morning at 3 a.m., I was getting my chicken ready for Shabbat and the art of smoking came to me. I was alone with the fire and with God, and I figured out exactly how much wood to use, how close to the fire to cook and for how long. On that morning, I discovered how wood behaves."

He took notes, he said, and after that his chicken sales doubled. "I use very little spices. The smoke seasons the chicken, and with 40 chickens cooking at a time, they self- baste."

Since then, he said the Toronto Star has named his chicken the best rotisserie chicken in the Greater Toronto Area, and Toronto Life magazine has listed Cookoos as one of the best takeouts.

All this time, however, he concentrated on his food and overlooked the imperfections in his surroundings. "I had Band-Aid solutions to repairs, and the restaurant desperately needed refreshing."

He contacted Restaurant Makeover, he said, and in his application told them that he needed a facelift of the restaurant's physical structure and it's menu and food presentation.

"The drama of my appeal lay in the fact that I had put everything on the line to produce the best roasted chicken. I had mastered the cooking technique, but I needed guidance to make my concept a genuine success story. My restaurant needed a new soul."

As Cookoos was the first kosher restaurant to have a makeover done by the show, Boussidan had to teach the crew – including Toronto chef and Food Network Canada host Michael Bonacini – about kashrut.

The show also had to change its production schedule, because while a restaurant is typically redone in one week, they had to cease work for Shabbat.

Michael Taylor, Restaurant Makeover's line producer, called Boussidan "the perfect candidate. He's hardworking, ambitious, funny, and most important he has a great concept. The kosher aspect was no problem at all – we worked it into our schedule."

The results, said Boussidan – he was not allowed into the restaurant until it was ready – "are amazing. When I first walked in, I was shocked."

The most important change, he said, is that the crew, along with restaurant designer Glen Peloso, framed his "chicken theatre" with stone. "It is the centrepiece of the store, and it shows beautifully. Now when people walk in, they are greeted by a gorgeous stone wall."

They also replaced the counter that ran along the window and wall with a banquette and tables, redid the tile walls, and replaced the diamond-tiled floor with a tobacco-coloured stained wood. "

Boussidan said that chef Bonacini developed a Joe Boos homemade barbecue sauce and chicken rub, and created a grilled chicken salad with baby spinach, mango and avocado in a lime citrus dressing and a grilled chicken wrap with pareve cheese.

"It was his first adventure into kosher food," Boussidan said, "and he enjoyed it."

Chai Folk Ensemble will perform in Toronto, Vancouver and Detroit

Chai Folk Ensemble tours Canada, U.S.

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG —The Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble, Winnipeg's 44-year-old Israeli dance troupe, recently won a gold medal at the annual Winnipeg Dance Festival.

The internationally renowned Chai dancers competed in the festival on May 19, for the first time in many years. Chai won the medal, with the highest marks ever in the competition.

In mid-June, Chai is off on a tour that, under the leadership of volunteer executive consultant Earl Barish, has become an annual event. For this year's Am Yisrael Chai Independence Tour, the young artists will perform at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts on June 15; in Detroit (for the very first time) on June 17; and in Vancouver, in a June 19 performance sponsored by the Louis Brier Jewish Aged Foundation.

"Pearl Gladman from B'nai Brith was in the audience when Chai appeared in Toronto last year," Barish says. "She was so impressed with the show that she arranged with B'nai Brith and Maccabi Canada to invite Chai to come back again this year."

The Detroit performance is in honour of Arline Bittker, a longtime B'nai Brith leader in that city. Chai appeared in Vancouver two years ago to help the Louis Brier Home and Hospital.

The tour will "bring the ensemble back to some of the very stages from which the magic of Chai's performances first touched national audiences," artistic director Tracy Kasner-Greaves says.

"Chai's national reputation has been growing steadily over the past several years, and it is an honour for us to be chosen by so many communities to represent the essence of Israel's milestone birthday."

Barish says there were other cities that wanted Chai this year, but the company couldn't fit them into the schedule. "Perhaps next year," he adds.

It was in 1964 that Sarah Sommer, a popular music teacher in Winnipeg's Jewish school system, had an idea for a new Jewish-Israeli folk dance group. She started the company with a half-dozen teenage girls, students at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate. Unfortunately, Sommer did not live to see the fruits of the seed she planted.

Chai, with a staff of 45, including dancers, singers, musicians and technical people, performs a variety of Israeli and Yiddish pieces, many of them choreographed for the company. Dances from countries in which Jewish culture has flourished – Yemen, Morocco, Spain, Greece, Brazil, Russia, Poland and Israel – are part of the company's repertoire. Performances include horahs and Oriental rhythms, klezmer and chassidic melodies and the latest Israeli hits. Each year, the ensemble tries to introduce new material.

Chai has performed across Canada and has made appearances in Florida, at Walt Disney World; in Mexico City at the Festival Aviv; and has toured Israel in 1998.

Chai returns to Winnipeg after its Vancouver performance to begin preparing for its next local performances at the Israel Pavilion's Shalom Square during Folklorama, from Aug. 3 to 8.

Winnipeg walks with Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Community members, young and old, Jewish and non-Jewish, celebrated Israel's 60th birthday May 25 with a solidarity walk that had close to 250 participants, many of whom waved Israeli flags and wore Celebrate 60 – Walk the Land T-shirts.

Most people walked and talked with friends and aquaintances, and a group of spirited walkers sang Israeli songs in Hebrew.

Irene and John Plantz and their family came from Dugald, Man., to participate. "My husband, John, learned that his father was Jewish after he was studying in Bible college and met a rabbi who told him his last name was a Jewish one," said Irene Plantz, who is a Mennonite. "John began looking into his roots and found out his grandfather was Jewish. We just returned from Israel where we looked up our name in the Diaspora Museum in Tel Aviv. My husband says that, even as a child, he always wanted to go to Israel. It's like it was in his heart. Even before we learned of this, we had signed up for Christian Friends For Israel. We wanted to do this walk together."

Karla Berbrayer and Allan Kraut, who have four children, even brought their dog, Zooky. "When we were at the door about to leave the house this morning, we told everyone that we were going to the Walk For Israel, and Zooky was the first one to show up. So we decided to bring him," said Karla, who is the producer of the Israeli concert series here.

Ksenia Khomenko, a young Israeli of Russian descent now living in Winnipeg, was glad to come and bring her 22-year-old friend Margarita Sajin, who came to visit her from Israel.

"I didn't expect something like this to be taking place here," said Sajin, who lives with her mother in Haifa. "I just finished my Israeli army service not long ago, and it's very encouraging to see an event like this taking place. It's nice to hear so many people speaking Hebrew. The security situation in Israel is not a simple one, and I feel that things there can change suddenly."

Twenty members of the First Nations community also joined the walk. Jason Monias, a 29-year-old student training as a computer technician, and his friend William Robertson held a large banner that read: "Canadian First Nations Stand with Israel." Monias said he had heard about the walk from the pastor of his church and was glad to participate.

Marsha and Allen Freidman and their two daughters, Shira and Hadara, decided to ride their bikes instead of walking, just in case it started to rain.

Nola Lazar, who was walking with her family, said she "could use a good falafel after this walk."

Participants in the one-hour walk met at the Asper Jewish Community Campus and followed a route down Corydon Avenue through North River Heights and Wellington Cresent.

After the walk, there was a celebration at the community campus attended by more than 400 people. Children were treated to entertainment, inflatable bouncers, face painting, balloon shapes and Israeli arts and crafts. Transportation to and from the campus was available for seniors, provided by the Daniel Tallman Family Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

The events were sponsored by the Rady Jewish Community Centre, Jewish National Fund, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and the Jewish Federation of Manitoba.

"We're very pleased with the way this day turned out. There was a really nice atmosphere," said Tamar Barr, programming director of the Rady JCC. "This Walk the Land celebration is a worldwide event, and we're glad that Winnipeg is one of the participating communities.

"Years ago, when I was a child, there used to be walks for Israel like this, but we haven't done something like this for a long time," Barr added. "So we thought it was an appropriate way to celebrate Israel's 60th. I'm glad that all of the organizations joined forces to do this together."

An Evening to Benefit the Community of Sderot

SUNDAY JUNE 15 2008

The North American Debut of Israeli Roots/Soul/ Reggae Superstar

MOSH BEN ARI

Lead singer of the renowned world music group Sheva and composer of the int'l hit "Salaam"

"Sderot is a community of 22,000 people in Israel that is situated one km from Gaza. Residents of the town of Sderot have been targeted by Hamas with daily rocket attacks causing death, destruction and an intolerable climate of fear. Money raised from this concert will go directly to build a gymboree that will be attached to the local grocery store in Sderot. No longer will a parent have to choose whether to leave their children at home with the possibility of a rocket hitting their unprotected family or whether to bring them on a simple outing to the grocery store with nowhere to run. Parents will be able to drop their children off at the reinforced gymboree and shop with peace of mind. When a rocket attack occurs, all of those parents grocery shopping can also run for shelter into the gymboree and comfort their kids in safety. The residents of Sderot have 15 seconds to make it to a reinforced shelter".

Ben Ari to play Toronto benefit concert for Sderot

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Israeli roots and reggae singing star Mosh Ben Ari will be making his North American debut in Toronto later this month in a benefit concert for Sderot.

On Sunday, June 15, at 8 p.m., Ben Ari will kick off a three-week North American tour, his first, with a concert at Toronto's Mod Club (722 College St.), with proceeds going to the beleaguered Negev town.

Three nights later, he'll play Montreal's Club Opera before moving on to San Francisco, Los Angeles and New York City.

The lead singer for the acclaimed world-music group Sheva, Ben Ari has released three solo albums, the last of which, 2006's Massa Umatan (Go Giving), became one of the best-selling Israeli albums of all time.

Rachelle Bronfman, a local Israel activist and an executive producer for the concert, told The CJN she helped convince the event's organizers to make it a fundraiser for Sderot.

She's also doing her part to drum up additional money for the town by selling special "VIP tickets" to fans and supporters.

"I am personally selling tickets for $250 each to ensure that enough money is raised," she said. Though VIP tickets are already being sold for $65, Bronfman said she wanted to hold back a block of them for concerned people who could "afford to spend the extra money" to help Sderot.

The VIP tickets grant the holders the privilege of a dinner and "meet and greet" with Ben Ari and his band after the show. As of last Friday, Bronfman said she'd sold 100 of her tickets.

"The residents of Sderot want to build a reinforced Gymboree that will be attached to the grocery store in Sderot. Right now, parents have to decide if they should leave their children at home with the high possibility of being hit by a rocket, or do they bring them to grocery shop with them with nowhere to run for safety when rockets rain down," Bronfman said.

Proceeds from the concert will go to the Sderot Defence Council (Ofek Chadash Division), to "assist in the process of rebuilding vital infrastructure and to provide aid to those families who are suffering not just emotionally but physically and financially as well as a result of these constant rocket attacks," organizers said in a press release.

Ben Ari, who is of Yemenite and Iraqi descent, is a student of Middle Eastern music. Besides singing, he plays a variety of instruments, including classical guitar, Indian Sarod, Persian Tar, Turkish Jumbush and Moroccan Ginberi.

Prominent Calgary lawyer Robert Barron dies at 91

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Prominent Calgary lawyer Robert Barron died May 15 in Calgary at age 91.

Barron, the second son of J.B. and Amelia Barron, was born in Calgary on Nov. 29, 1916. A lifelong Calgarian and a member of the city's highly influential Barron family, he graduated with the Chief Justice's Gold Medal in Law and other awards from the University of Alberta law school in 1938.

Walter Barron, Robert's first cousin, who has been practising law since 1952, remembers him as "one of the most brilliant legal minds I had ever met.

"Whenever I called him, he would have an answer for me within minutes."

Among his many achievements in the Jewish community, Barron served as president of the Calgary Hebrew School for 14 years.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Queen's think-tank praises Israeli democracy

By JORDAN PRESS
Special to The CJN

KINGSTON — Despite constant threats to its existence, the State of Israel has built a flourishing democracy that could serve as a model for its Arab neighbours, according to two new studies by a Queen's University think-tank.

Israel's experience over the past 60 years is also relevant to ongoing efforts to create a stable Afghanistan and American efforts to create a democracy in Iraq, said the chairman of the university's Centre for the Study of Democracy.

Tom Axworthy believes that Canadian and NATO forces that are trying to build a democracy in Afghanistan could have avoided pitfalls in the process had they looked at the birth of democracy in Israel.

Over the past 60 years, Israel has become a country that gives rights to its Arab minority and holds human rights in the highest regard, despite constant threats to its existence, Axworthy said.

"When we read of Israel… the image is always of the Gaza Strip or security issues. The more positive issue is a people building democracy in the Israeli state," said Axworthy, who was a senior aide to former prime minister Pierre Trudeau. "Israelis have been able to balance their immediate fear about security to a longer commitment to freedom and tolerance."

Country's experience relevant to situation in Afghanistan, Iraq

Axworthy said Israel's democratic development holds lessons for other countries in the Middle East.

"We're not saying Israel's a perfect state, but out of a difficult situation, they created a democracy under extreme duress," Axworthy said. "If someone had said Israel was going to, A, survive and, B, create a stable democracy in 1948, there were a lot of people who wouldn't have taken that bet."

On May 20, the centre released two papers about Israeli democracy on the 60th anniversary of the state's founding. The first is a detailed analysis of four key lessons from the development of democracy in Israel. The second outlines how Israeli courts and the Knesset developed a human rights code without the help of a constitution and made human rights the highest priority in Israeli law-making.

The centre has been invited present the first study, titled "New State to Sustained Democracy," at the 12th Biennial Jerusalem Conference in Canadian Studies in Israel next month.

The papers are the first in a series of studies on foreign democracies that the centre is releasing this year. Future studies will look at Liberia, Costa Rica and the Palestinian territories. Previous studies examined Taiwan and Afghanistan.

One of the first moves the new Israeli government made in 1948 was to disarm all the private militias that had been established in the years leading up to independence.

Then-prime minister David Ben Gurion made this bold step to ensure that order spread throughout the land, Axworthy said.

"How many times have we not done that?" he asked.

He added that "we're fooling ourselves" if Canada believes that private militias in Afghanistan will disarm on their own.

Canadian forces and the Afghan government haven't disarmed warlords and their private armies because of the ongoing fight against the Taliban, Axworthy said.

Until the warlords are disarmed, Afghanistan "will never be a secure state," he said.

The same applies to ongoing U.S. efforts in Iraq, he added.

"Israel made a whole series of intellectual decisions in its founding that would have been helpful in Iraq," Axworthy said.

Based on the Israeli model, stability can only come about if people believe the law will protect them, Axworthy said.

Israel's founders focused on creating a state in which citizens believe in the judicial system and don't take the law into their own hands, he added.

"If there's one thing lacking in the Middle East, it's that – the rule of law," Axworthy said. "The key thing is one cannot begin a democratic state with private militias with vast amount of arms."

Canadian and NATO forces also shouldn't have tried to craft the perfect constitution for Afghanistan, he said, adding that Israel's democracy evolved because the founders "built on what they knew and improved it."

He concluded: "The lesson of Israel is don't start anew. Don't write a new constitution. Write something based on what people know."

Over the years, the second study argues, the courts in Israel and the Knesset allowed for the development of human rights without the help of a written constitution. Each time the courts ruled that government policy violated human rights, laws changed, but Knesset members didn't enact new laws to overrule the courts.

"The Knesset, for it's part, did not stop the court from fulfilling its human right aspirations," the study says. "Despite constant criticism of the court's activism, the Knesset did not take any actual steps to curtail the court's power.

"Therefore, ironically, even though the Israeli system has been the subject of a tortured debate between the powers of the courts and the powers of the legislature, what enabled the most distinctive feature of the rule of law in Israel was the partnership between them."

The courts have ruled in cases that promote freedom of the press, freedom of speech and equal rights for Arabs.

The papers are available online at www.queensu.ca/csd.

Toronto photographer lives a life in snapshots

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Life as a photojournalist is often full of challenges, but the adrenalin surge of being on scene to capture a specific moment in time, a historic event or a snapshot of human drama, makes up for it all.

So says Joshua Meles, 34, a Toronto photographer and former Israel-based freelance photojournalist who worked to cover some of the events of the second intifadah in the early part of the decade.

Joshua Meles

"It's a rush making a connection with strangers," he admitted. "The camera allows me to witness human behaviour during and after an event."

A lifelong Zionist and Israel activist – Meles has visited Israel numerous times and worked for a year as the national co-ordinator for Betar in New York in the late 1990s – the York University political science grad decided to pursue the art of the camera shortly after his studies.

Meles moved to New York to apprentice with a studio photographer after graduating and eventually found himself working as a photojournalist with the Jewish World Services.

In 1999, the publication sent him out on a 10-day assignment to Israel, and he stayed on at his expense for another two weeks. The experience only served to whet his appetite for pursuing photojournalism, particularly in the Holy Land.

Then, one day in October 2000, Meles made a spur-of-the-moment decision to go back. He booked a ticket to Israel from Toronto, then called his family to let them know where he was going to work.

Like any journalist thinking about covering a "hot" zone, Meles had his reservations about leaving the comfort of North America to work in the often chaotic Middle East, but in the end couldn't resist the allure of being on the ground in the Holy Land to snap away as events unfolded.

"My family was concerned [about the decision], but there was nothing they could do because I was already in the cab on the way to the airport," to catch his El Al flight to Jerusalem, he said.

A construction worker at Charles and and Wellesley streets in downtown Toronto

Once there, Meles was hired by Flash 90, a Jerusalem-based photo agency that provides pictures to many of the country's daily newspapers and for international news agencies.

It was a lifestyle he loved, he said.

"It wasn't a nine-to-five job. I had a cellphone and a pager, and this other radio device. When I went to bed at night, I never set an alarm because one of them would start beeping," Meles told Heebonics in a recent interview at his Toronto studio.

"If I [was roused] at night, I knew it was bad news for someone," he said, referring to the tragic nature of some of the stories he'd have to cover. "I loved the unpredictability of it."

Meles made aliyah in 2001. However, things didn't pan out with work prospects in Israel, and he returned to Canada in September of that year to resume his photographic career as a local freelancer and portrait photographer.

But the call of Israel was too much to resist for long, and in 2003 Meles went back to "pound the pavement" and look for more work in his new homeland, he said.

"The sort of things I was seeing in Israel impacted me greatly," Meles said. "My grandparents were Holocaust survivors, so I had very strong opinions [about Israel]."

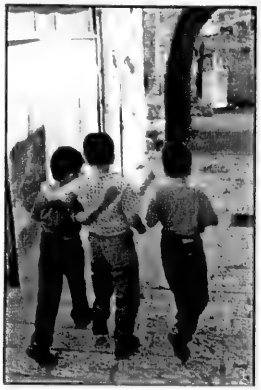
Meles said that while he still considers himself an ardent Zionist, he concedes that his work in Israel "opened my eyes."

"I realized my view was narrow. I was seeing a lot of suffering on both sides... and I realized how difficult it is to form any point of view about the [Palestinian-Israeli] conflict from abroad. The delineation of sides in Israel is not as clear there as it is from Toronto," he said.

In the course of covering numerous stories throughout Israel, the West Bank and Gaza, Meles said the absurdity of watching people his own age trying to kill each other eventually overtook his thoughts.

"There's a pointlessness to it all," he said, sighing. "I thought, 'here are these peoples who could have a good future. Instead, they're throwing rocks or shooting at each other. I didn't see how this could achieve any change. The Palestinians' energy... could be better used spent building lives rather than throwing rocks. I wish their leadership would take those lives into consideration instead of focusing on the struggle against Israel."

Despite the suffering he observed, Meles said the mere fact that he could work as a freelance photographer and cover any story he wished, unfettered by restrictions, made him appreciate the unique nature of Israel in the region.



Children walking in the old city of Hebron

On his website, www.meles.ca, Meles features a picture he captured of a Palestinian youth in Ramallah throwing a rock at Israeli forces. The image is striking in its clarity, and one wonders how a Jewish cameraman was allowed access to the scene.

A Palestinian boy tries to hit an Israeli girl in Hebron following an exchange of slurs, as an Israeli soldier and police officer look on. [Joshua Meles photos]

In answer, Meles grants that he realized being in the presence of armed Palestinian militants was potentially hazardous to his health, but that he felt compelled to be there, he said.

Though he was rarely required to show identification to his Palestinian guides – who assumed he was a Canadian journalist and were unsuspecting of his ethnicity – Meles noted that he knew there were times and places where he should "not be practising my Hebrew" and where he would only show his Canadian identification and not his Israeli one.

"Without my job, I'd have no business being there," he said. "But I enjoyed making a connection. Being in that situation, you saw that these people, with their different goals, were still human."

Stating his belief in the potential for rapprochement in Israel, Meles recalled a story he covered about a Palestinian family that decided to donate a family member's organs to an Israeli patient after he'd been killed by the Israel Defence Forces in a skirmish.

"Holding a gun or having one pointed at you is an unfortunate way to spend your life," he mused.

Meles has since returned to Toronto, gotten married and has opened his own studio, where he shoots portraits for a wide range of clients.

He noted that one of his major sources of revenue now is taking portrait shots for Jewish singles who want to look good on Internet dating sites.

"Those clients all say the same thing, 'I don't want it to look like a studio photo," he said, smiling.

He's also in the business of photography for weddings and other events, while he continues to pitch his freelance skills to publications around town.

In the end though, photojournalism remains his passion. "This is something I'll always be doing."

Dairy recipe for Shavuot

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

If Pesach signals the emergence of spring, then with Shavuot, the season bursts forth in a riot of colour and luscious flavours.

"The midrash tells us that although Mount Sinai is in the desert," writes Susie Fishbein, author of the popular Kosher by Design cookbooks, "it suddenly bloomed with fragrant flowers and grasses on the morning that the Torah was given to the Jewish people. The custom of decorating our homes and synagogues with leafy branches and flowers is based on this miracle."

The concept for the first book in Fishbein's series, Kosher by Design (Artscroll), began with a Shavuot idea. To celebrate the holiday, Fishbein visualized a cascading flowerpot salad bar and began interviewing party planners to help create this setting.

"There was a glimmer in one woman's eye as she started to rattle off ideas to make the salad bar even more spectacular," Fishbein told me by phone from her home in New Jersey, "and I cancelled all my other appointments. I knew she was the one."

"The one" turned out to be Renee Erreich, and the luscious table settings and presentation ideas she and Fishbein created – and photographer John Uher shot – fairly leap off the page.

"Food is so much a part of the Jewish holidays that it enriches the experience to tie the food into the holiday traditions," Fishbein said. "I picked recipes for specific holidays if they fit in a fun or interesting way."

When we think Shavuot, we think dairy, and Fishbein's Savoury Goat Cheese Strudel makes an elegant holiday dish. "People want things that are different, but they don't have the time or the ability to spend seven hours in the kitchen," she said. "The one or two times that I put something more labour intensive in the book was because it's really worth it, like this outrageous recipe for Shavuot. It has a lot of steps, but it's laid out very carefully."

But why cheese for Shavuot? I asked James Beard award-winner Gil Marks, author of Olive Trees and Honey: A Treasury of Vegetarian Recipes from Jewish Communities Around the World (Wiley Publishing).

"The use of dairy to celebrate this holiday is not a biblical injunction, nor is it mentioned in the Talmud," Marks told me. "Shavuot falls when the animals are beginning to be weaned away from the mother, so you have a surplus of milk and therefore cheese, yogurt and dairy products. Once you have a tradition, you will find biblical reasons for it."

Herdsmen of almost 6,000 years ago stored milk in the waterproof stomachs of animals – "the first bottles," he said. These ancient people discovered that when the milk separated, it coagulated into curds – the first fresh cheese – which not only tasted good, but lasted longer than milk. (Blintzes would come much later!)

More importantly, Shavuot commemorates the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai. "No Jews existed before the giving of the Torah," Marks said. "Technically speaking, Israelites before then were not Jews. One of the new laws concerned keeping kosher, and since their utensils and any meat products they had produced before were no longer kosher, for the first Shavuot, they had to eat dairy products.

"In addition, the tradition exists that while they were at Sinai receiving the Torah, when they came back to camp, their milk had curdled into cheese, so you have a variety of mystical and somewhat biblical reasons that developed for the association with dairy."

SAVOURY GOAT CHEESE STRUDEL

Source: Kosher by Design by Susie Fishbein

12 thin asparagus spears (only the top 3 to 4 in.)
2 portobello mushroom caps, cleaned with gills scooped out olive oil
salt
freshly ground black pepper
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 large Vidalia or Spanish onion, sliced into thin rings
1 sprig fresh thyme, stem removed
4 tbsp. sugar
1 cup white wine vinegar or red wine vinegar
14 oz. goat cheese
2 sticks unsalted butter, melted
1 package phyllo dough sheets, defrosted
2 cups Merlot or other dry red wine
1 tsp. cornstarch

Preheat over to 425. Place asparagus and mushrooms on a baking sheet. Brush with olive oil, sprinkle with salt and pepper. Roast for 12-15 minutes. Remove from oven. Slice mushrooms into very thin slices; set aside.

Heat the 1 tbsp. olive oil in a medium pot over medium heat. Add sliced onion and cook for 6-8 minutes, until translucent. Add leaves from sprig of thyme and sugar. Cook for 6-7 minutes; onions should be caramelized. Add vinegar. Bring to a boil, then reduce to a simmer; cook about 12-15 minutes or until the vinegar is almost all gone. Make sure not to burn onions, and stir occasionally. You should have a soft nest of golden sweet onions. Season with salt and pepper.

While onions are still hot, place them in the bowl of a food processor fitted with a metal blade. Add goat cheese and pulse until thoroughly combined. Remove and reserve at room temperature.

The dish can be made in advance up until this point and brought back to room temperature, assembled and cooked before serving.

Preheat oven to 425. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper. Unfold sheets of phyllo dough so you have a large horizontal rectangle in front of you. Using a sharp, not serrated knife, make a vertical cut down the middle so you are left with two stacks of vertical rectangles.

Take one sheet of phyllo, brush with melted butter, and top with another sheet of phyllo. Do this again so you have a stack of four buttered sheets. Form an even, log-shaped mound of the cheese mixture along the bottom shorter edge of the pastry.

Top with 3 asparagus spears and a few slices of portobello. Roll once to cover filling. Fold the right and left sides over the centre and roll, jelly-roll style, until completely closed. (Like a blintz.)

Brush with melted butter. Place on prepared baking sheet. Repeat 3 more times. Bake uncovered for 6-8 minutes or until golden brown.

Place the Merlot in a small saucepan. Dissolve the cornstarch in 1 teaspoon water. Whisk into Merlot. Bring to a boil; sauce will thicken. Drizzle over the strudels, or place in a squeeze bottle and decorate the plate with the syrup. Makes 4 servings.

U.S. businessman testifies about ties to Olmert

By ROY EITAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — After weeks of legal limbo and widespread speculation about his role in Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's latest corruption scandal, American Jewish businessman Morris Talansky had his day in an Israeli court last week.

The Long Island, N.Y., financier was deposed May 27 by Israeli prosecutors, bringing into public view the story that broke in April when Talansky was questioned by police during a Passover visit to Israel.

Occasionally breaking down in tears and appealing to be allowed to return home to New York, the 75-year-old Talansky told Jerusalem's District Court about some $150,000 (US) in cash handouts he allegedly made to Olmert in the 15 years before Olmert became prime minister.

"I looked at him as a man who could accomplish a great deal," Talansky said, according to court reporters.

Talansky said he admired Olmert's "ability to articulate, his ability to reach out to the American people, the largest and richest community of Jews in the world – and we are losing them at the fastest rate you can imagine."

"And that's why I supported him," Talansky said. "That's why I gave it to him. That's why I supported the man, that's why I overlooked – frankly and honestly – a lot of things. I overlooked them. Maybe I shouldn't have, but I overlooked them."

Olmert has admitted taking money from Talansky, saying it was used to finance his successful 1992 and 1998 campaigns for the Jerusalem mayoralty, as well as an unsuccessful bid in 2003 to head the Likud Party.

Though Israeli law puts strict limits on foreign contributions to political causes, Olmert has insisted on his innocence and pledged to resign if indicted.

The prospect of such a major government shake-up comes as Olmert pursues renewed peace talks with Syria as well as efforts to clinch an accord on Palestinian statehood before U.S. President George W. Bush leaves office in January.

Talansky's payments to Olmert have raised the spectre that the prime minister could be charged with bribery. Olmert has denied taking bribes, and he has tried to distance himself from Talansky by saying that his former law partner, Uri Messer, handled the exchanges of money.

Talansky, who has worked as a fundraiser for Israeli charities and has an international minibar business, told the court he received nothing from Olmert in return for the cash.

"I never expected anything personally," he testified. "I never had any personal benefits from this relationship whatsoever."

But apparently it was not for lack of trying.

According to Talansky, Olmert put him in touch with U.S. Jewish casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, Israeli real estate magnate Yitzhak Tshuva and the late Roland Arnall, the founder of Ameriquest, in the hope they could do business. Nothing came of the contacts.

"I said to myself, 'I'm never going to go to a politician for business,'" Talansky told the court with a laugh. "He wanted to do me a favour and it never worked out."

Talansky's May 27 court appearance was a "preliminary deposition" – a procedure Olmert's lawyers tried, and failed, to block.

Talansky was questioned by State Attorney Moshe Lador, who said the probe is focusing on Olmert's receipt of large sums of undocumented cash while serving as the mayor of Jerusalem and as Israel's minister of industry, trade and infrastructure.

Lador's office has withheld comment on what, if any, charges could be brought against the prime minister, who has survived three other criminal probes of his conduct in public office.

"We are not currently thinking of an indictment," Lador told reporters, adding that Talansky would be recalled next month for more questioning. In the meantime, he was expected to be allowed to leave Israel and return home to the United States.

Israel still waiting for answers from Hezbollah and show that in exchange for body parts, they get a live person."

Israeli officials said they thought the prisoner swap would take several weeks to finalize. Hezbollah-run Al-Manar television said Sunday that the rest of the Lebanese prisoners in Israel would be released "soon."

Pathologists at the Abu Kabir Institute of Forensic Medicine began examining the remains on Sunday and hope to come up with positive identification, possibly in as little as two days, though the process could take up to several weeks.

The Israel Defence Forces has a list of nine soldiers killed in the 2006 war who were not buried intact, and the pathologists will attempt to match up the remains with those soldiers, after which the additional remains will also be buried.

The families of soldiers who were not buried intact were informed of this before the funeral, a senior military official said. The IDF said Maj.-Gen. Elazar Stern has appointed a team to update the bereaved families as necessary.

Security officials said Sunday they thought the remains would also include the body parts of soldiers killed when a helicopter was damaged by a Hezbollah rocket in southern Lebanon. Five people were killed in the helicopter crash.

Nasser was returned to Lebanon by the International Red Cross under the military supervision of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon. He was transferred directly to Hezbollah representatives.

The contact between Israel and Hezbollah took place with German mediation under the aegis of the United Nations. German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who visited Lebanon Sunday, said he was glad of the developments and hoped they would help the talks taking place.

Meanwhile, Israel has yet to receive a clear response from Hezbollah about its agreement to the conditions for the prisoner swap, which calls on Hezbollah to free IDF soldiers Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, whose abduction sparked the Second Lebanon War. In the deal, Israel would release several Hezbollah prisoners and Palestinian terrorist Samir Kuntar.

"The ball is in Hezbollah's court," said a senior security source involved in talks with Hezbollah. "We explained our conditions and they still have to give us answers." The source said Israel expected to hear a detailed answer from German mediator Gerhard Konrad.

At a festive welcome reception held in a soccer field in the Lebanese village of Naqoura, Hezbollah official Nabil Kaouk said: "There is no full sovereignty and no full dignity as long as even a single prisoner remains in an Israeli jail." Kaouk said Hezbollah would work to free the other Lebanese prisoners and that this was the only standard by which the dignity of the nation could be measured.

Nasser, a former Israeli citizen and the father of two Israeli daughters, kissed the ground when he set foot in Lebanon. He embraced his six siblings and his mother, Valentine Nasser, who grew up Jewish but converted to Islam when she met Nasser's father.

Security talks held

Israeli and Palestinian security heads met May 27 in Ramallah to co-ordinate policy. Talks focused on "the activity of the Palestinian Security Forces in the area of Jenin and northern Samaria," the Israeli army said. A major Palestinian Authority force was deployed in Jenin in recent weeks, the first since before the second intifadah started in 2000. Washington had pressed Israel to facilitate the deployment, saying the relatively moderate PA government needs troops to shore up its credibility and confront Hamas, the terror group that controls Gaza and has designs on the West Bank. Israel is wary of allowing the PA force to build up arms because of past defections from such forces to terror groups.

MK threatens Olmert?

A right-wing Israeli MK drew fire for suggesting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert should be executed if he cedes the Golan Heights to Syria. "Anyone who has committed an act which could cause the country's territory to be ceded is liable to imprisonment or the death sentence," Arye Eldad of the National Union bloc said May 26, after it was announced Israel and Syria had relaunched peace talks. For many, the remarks recalled the rhetoric against prime minister Yitzhak Rabin before his 1995 assassination by an extremist opposed to Israeli-Palestinian peace talks. Eldad said he was merely citing Israel's penal code. Unlike the West Bank and Gaza, the Golan was annexed by Israel, meaning it falls under sovereign law.

Shekel goes global

Israel's currency, the shekel, is now legal tender internationally. It can now be used in trading overseas, with banks worldwide converting it to other currencies, the Israeli business daily, Globes, reported. Israeli firms will also be able to make payments in shekels to customers abroad. The change comes after Israel received recognition from CLS Bank International, the international currency clearing system. Mexico's peso was also recognized. The CLS membership recognizes the shekel as one of the world's strongest currencies, Globes said.

U.S. eyes more Syrian sites

The United States reportedly suspects Syria of hiding several nuclear sites besides a secret reactor destroyed by Israel. Citing U.S. officials, the Washington Post reported May 29 that the Bush administration wants the International Atomic Energy Agency to expand the scope of a planned inspection of Syria. The IAEA has asked Syria for permission to examine a site bombed by Israel last September that the CIA says was a secret, North Korean-built plutonium reactor. The Post said the United States is now arguing that at least three other Syrian locations should be looked at too.

Embattled slaughterhouse seeks new CEO

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — Mounting pressure from Jewish groups and members of the U.S. Congress has led America's largest kosher slaughterhouse to start looking for a new CEO just weeks after federal agents arrested nearly 400 of its employees in a huge immigration raid.

Aaron Rubashkin, the founder of Agriprocessors, said May 23 that he intends to find a replacement for his son, Sholom, as company CEO.

The announcement follows statements from three Jewish organizations raising the specter of a boycott, the launch of a campaign by the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, and a call from U.S. Rep. Bruce Braley for an investigation of the company.

"The best course of action for the company, its employees, the local community and our customers is to bring new leadership to Agriprocessors," the senior Rubashkin said in a statement.

The Brooklyn butcher and Chabad-Lubavitcher, who founded the company in 1987, added, "The company has begun the search for a new permanent chief executive officer. We have engaged a team of industry experts to help us identify and secure a new leader who can help us meet the needs of Agriprocessors today and in the future. We will make more information on the search process available by the end of next week."

The statement reiterated that "due to pending legal issues," the company would not respond to specific allegations. They include charges of hiring underage workers, sexual harassment and withholding of overtime pay.

Rubashkin's move to replace his son comes as Agriprocessors is facing mounting legal problems and boycott threats following last month's raid. The company's problems have raised fears about a possible shortage of kosher meat and fired up the debate over whether Jewish religious bodies should take a more active role in monitoring the working conditions at kosher factories.

In response to the raid and related allegations about the situation at the plant in Postville, Iowa, the Jewish Labor Committee issued a statement May 23 calling for a boycott of Agriprocessors.

The company sells its kosher meat under various labels, including Aaron's Best, Aaron's Choice, Rubashkin's, European Glatt, Supreme Kosher, David's and Shor Habor.

In its statement, the Jewish Labor Committee asserted that the company had displayed "a clear pattern of employer negligence and even lawlessness," including the violation of child labor laws and toleration of various forms of worker abuse.

The committee's statement was followed by a "request" from the Conservative movement's top bodies that kosher consumers "evaluate whether it is appropriate to buy and eat meat products" from Agriprocessors.

Largest raid of its kind in U.S. history

That same day, Uri L'tzedek, a project started by students at Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, a liberal Orthodox rabbinical school in Manhattan, began circulating a petition asking Agriprocessors to pay its workers at least the federal minimum wage, abide by laws pertaining to workers' rights and treat employees according to Torah standards.

Organizers said that about 450 people from across the denominational spectrum had signed as of last week.

"Until these changes are made, we feel compelled to refrain from purchasing or consuming meat produced by your company, and will pressure every establishment with which we do business to cease purchase of your meat," the petition reads. "Effective June 15, 2008 we will stop patronizing any restaurant that sells your meat."

Meanwhile, the food workers union has taken out advertisements in major Jewish newspapers detailing the allegations against Agriprocessors. The union, which has waged a legal battle over its still-unsuccessful efforts to organize plant workers, has also started a website, EyeOnAgriprocessors.org, to publicize claims against the company.

The May 12 federal raid is said to be the largest of its kind in U.S. history. Of the 389 illegal immigrants apprehended, 297 pleaded guilty within days and were sentenced to short jail terms or probation, to be followed by deportation to their native countries.

Speculation is rife over whether prosecutors are investigating the company itself, especially after one Postville resident with ties to Agriprocessors confirmed last week that he had been summoned to appear before a grand jury. The local U.S. Attorney's Office wouldn't comment on the matter.

In Washington, the House Committee on Education and Labor held a hearing May 20 on the raid, focusing mainly on its impact on the children of detained workers. But members of Congress also have expressed concern that the raids targeted illegal workers while letting their employers off the hook.

Braley, who represents the northeast Iowa area where the plant is located, has called for a probe of the company.

Rabbi Menachem Genack, head of the Orthodox Union's kosher department, the largest kosher certifier of Agriprocessors, said the OU is awaiting the outcome of legal proceedings against the firm before making any decision. If Agriprocessors is found guilty of criminal charges, he said, the OU will withdraw its hechsher.

Interviews with some of Postville's Chabad residents and other observers suggest the haredi community is taking the accusations against Agriprocessors with a grain of salt. "The problem is, there's a mindset that you have to give the person the benefit of the doubt," said Binyomin Jolkovsky, editor of Jewish World Review and a longtime observer of haredi Jewry.

Israeli flag at the top of the world

By DAN GOLDBERG
JTA

SYDNEY, Australia — The first mother-daughter team to reach the summit of Mount Everest waved an Israeli flag on their way to the top.

Cheryl Bart and her daughter Nikki of Sydney, Australia, arrived atop the world's highest mountain in the wee hours of May 24, Nepal time.

"I am at the top of the world," Cheryl Bart radioed back to her colleagues at Everest Base Camp.

On May 27, a day after descending to the base camp, Cheryl Bart told JTA by satellite phone, "It hasn't really sunk in."

She said the view from the summit was awe-inspiring.

"Stepping up onto the roof of the world, my feeling was one of awe, silence and awe, that I was there," Bart said. "It was a full moon, so when you lifted your head up you could see the reflection of the mountain. It was quite spectacular. The sun just started to rise over in Tibet, so the pink clouds and pink tops of these mighty mountains were awesome."

Mother and daughter are both graduates of Moriah College, Australia's largest Jewish school. Cheryl is a non-executive director of several companies in Australia as well as an ambassador of the Australian chapter of the Peres Center for Peace.

Nikki Bart, in her final year of medical school, is co-chair of the Medical Students' Aid Project, which donates medical equipment and pharmaceuticals to Third World hospitals.

They are also the first mother-daughter duo to scale the peaks of the so-called seven summits – the highest mountains on each continent.

With a small flag of Israel in their backpack, the pair arrived in Nepal at the end of March, taking weeks to acclimate to the high altitude and bitter cold in preparation for temperatures that plunged to -30 C. They also had to overcome several setbacks during their ascent: the weather, nearby avalanches and high security when the Olympic torch was carried up the mountain.

On May 27, Cheryl Bart said she was looking forward to going home to Australia and to new challenges beyond.

"We have to go home, and we can't wait to see family and friends, have more showers and eat ice cream," she said. "But having reached the highest point on earth, we should probably go to the Dead Sea."

UN critic sees worrying signs about Durban II

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A "non-paper" distributed to participants of next year's Durban II conference contains worrying indications that the anti-racism gathering will cast Israel as a racist oppressor of Palestinians and will challenge freedom of the press, warns Anne Bayefsky, a law professor who monitors UN activities.

Bayefsky, who operates the Eye On The UN website, said the non-paper "is a laundry list of all the things governments intend to discuss" at Durban II, the followup to the notorious Durban I, the United Nations World Conference Against Racism. Critics say the 2001 gathering in South Africa was marked by anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism. "Egypt and Iran intend to discuss Israeli 'racism' against Palestinian victims [at Durban II]," the non-paper said.

Not given a formal UN symbol or number, the non-paper was discussed at the first substantive session of the Durban II preparatory committee, which met in April during the Passover holiday. "We can expect the African regional group, driven by the Organization of the Islamic Conference, will put this subject matter on the agenda. There's no sign the European Union is going to be able to prevent this discussion," Bayefsky said.

In addition, the document suggests implementing "a code of conduct on journalists, limiting freedom of expression. That should ring alarm bells for all democratic societies."

Bayefsky noted that in 1991 the United Nations rescinded its 1975 resolution equating Zionism with racism, but since then Israel's opponents have been attempting to portray the conflict as one of an Israeli apartheid regime targeting Palestinians.

"It's really Zionism as racism by any other name. Since it's passé and not in favour, it's taken on new words. Some people will invoke the language of apartheid regarding Israel."

With the Durban II planning committee headed by Libya and Iran and with other foes of Israel participating, the trend toward vilification of the Jewish state is becoming clear, Bayefsky said.

"There's no sign the EU is going to be able to prevent this discussion," she continued. They were unable to stand up to African and Islamic groups during discussions in the preparatory committee, including Islamic countries' efforts to disqualify the Canadian Council of Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA)'s request for accreditation. (CIJA eventually withdrew it's application.)

"On one item after another, they [the EU] roll over and play dead," she said.

"In some respects, Durban II will be worse than Durban I," Bayefsky continued. "Not just to isolate Israel as a racist state, but also assault on human rights' dearest values, particularly freedom of expression."

Some of the world's worst rights violators are using the defence of religion "to mount an attack on freedom of expression," she added.

On a brighter note, Bayefsky said Durban II, which will be held in Geneva from April 20 to 24, 2009, will not be accompanied by a parallel meeting of non-governmental organizations (NGOs). At Durban I, the NGO gathering was "where some of the most overt examples of gross anti-Semitism took place," she said.

Meanwhile, Jewish organizations from around the world gathered in Geneva last week as guests of UN Watch, another UN monitoring organization, to consider a Durban II strategy. Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, and former Congress president Keith Landy attended the meeting.

Farber said an alternative conference was discussed, but he believes it would be difficult to organize between now and April. "We're not there yet," he said, adding that an alternative conference could be held after Durban II instead.

"Canada was very much part of the focus in all the discussions because it took the lead" in withdrawing from Durban II, he said. "It was seen as a moral and ethical lead," and one that could influence other governments to do the same.

The participants of last week's meeting discussed "formulating red lines. After they are crossed, Jewish organizations would advocate that their governments pull out" of Durban II, Farber said.

Bayefsky believes the United Nations has "roped in" EU countries by holding the conference in its backyard, and she expects European countries will provide much of its funding.

If democracies remain at a conference marked by anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism, it is like debating Ernst Zundel about the Holocaust. It merely lends credibility to the anti-Semites, Farber said.

"Even for those who want to be at Durban II, once you determine the red lines, you just can't negotiate and be on the same stage with those who seek to discredit and disenfranchise the Jewish people and the State of Israel," he added.

Lapid served as justice minister

JERUSALEM — Yosef Lapid, a former Israeli justice minister who campaigned against Orthodox religious controls in the Jewish state, died.

Lapid, who was known by his childhood nickname Tommy, succumbed to cancer in a Tel Aviv hospital Sunday. He was 77.

Born in the former Yugoslavia, Lapid lost his father in the Holocaust but managed to survive in hiding with his mother. He immigrated to Israel as a youth, mastering Hebrew and becoming a leading journalist and playwright.

His bitterness at the welfare benefits and exemptions from military service enjoyed by fervently Orthodox Jews in Israel led Lapid into politics. At the helm of the secularist Shinui Party, he made impressive gains in the 2003 elections and was appointed justice minister in Ariel Sharon's coalition government.

Shinui eventually would bolt in a funding dispute and, its public image eroded by infighting and Lapid's occasional invective against minorities, was trounced in the 2006 elections.

Lapid returned to journalism, appearing regularly as a political commentator and defending his friend, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, against mounting allegations of corruption. While no friend of the Palestinian Authority, he also inveighed against the conduct of radical Israeli settlers in the West Bank.

1948...They Were There

Machalnik recalls the fight for Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

They say you can't go back again, but if they let him, Louis Laurie would do so in a heartbeat. Go back to fight for Israel, that is.

A tough-talking, no-nonsense octogenarian, Laurie is one of the surviving members of Machal – the group of nearly 3,500 foreign volunteers from 37 countries who rallied to the defence of the nascent Jewish state during Israel's 1948 War of Independence.

Recruited by agents of the Yishuv in 1947, Laurie and two other Jewish friends from Montreal signed on to help fight for the Jewish state's cause out of a deep sense of duty and kinship with their brothers and sisters across the sea, he told The CJN in a recent interview.

As he tells it, one day in 1947, he was contacted by a recruiter for the fledgling Zionist fighting force being assembled in British-occupied Palestine.

A painting titled Men Who Took the Hill at Tamra reproduces B Company as it stormed the hill, rendered by former Machalnik and B Company soldier Stanley Klorman.
[Reproduction courtesy Louis Laurie]

"I'd had no interest in Israel until that time," Laurie said. "But we heard the story of [then-Canadian prime minister] Mackenzie King and his quote of 'none is too many,' and we got angry. And having served in the Canadian forces, we agreed to go to Israel."

Laurie and a host of Machalniks from the United States, Great Britain, Canada, South Africa, Morocco and elsewhere, arrived in Israel by boat in 1948 – Laurie sailed on the Pan Swallow out of Marseille, France. He recalled that upon their arrival, they were immediately given a speech by the soon-to-be first prime minister of Israel, David Ben-Gurion.

"The first words out of his mouth to us were, 'Chayalim v'chayalot!' (soldiers!)," Laurie said with a smile. "Then we were sent to a former British camp north of Nahariya. We were only there a few days before we saw our first action on Tamra Hill [in the western Galilee]."

For followers of Israel's War of Independence, the Tamra Hill battle represents a unique and historic moment in modern Israeli warfare.

Throughout the summer of 1948, the hill was held by regulars of the Arab Liberation Army in support of Syrian troops in the area. As a strategic position, it allowed the Arab army to fire upon traffic on a main road that bridged the north and south of the Galilee.

Laurie and a host of other Machal fighters were assigned to B Company of the 72nd infantry battalion. Orders came down from command that on Sept. 6, 1948, at 10 p.m., B Company was to take the hill and hold it for the Haganah (the pre-state militia).

"We were stuck in Tamra for 36 hours, fighting Iraqis," Laurie said.

According to literature from the American Veterans of Israel (AVI), over the course of the next two days, platoons from B Company rushed the hill, attacking with bayonets affixed to their rifles, eventually winning the skirmish.

The AVI says that engagement remains "the only bayonet charge in the annals of the IDF."

But there were more battles to be fought by Laurie and B Company.

"We were in Sasa, Tsfat... we did a lot of patrols behind enemy lines, that was our job. You never knew where bullets would come from," Laurie recalled of his unit's activities. "We were doing something very few people would want to do and we were proud. I was proud of it."

Once the war was over, Laurie stayed on in Israel for an extra year, training as an officer. However, he fell ill and was released by the Haganah. He returned to Canada in 1949, eventually settling in Toronto, where he met his wife, Rose, in 1950.

He became a successful entrepreneur, heading up various businesses over the years, and at 80, is now the president of Laurie Associates Inc., a metals and magnets manufacturer in Toronto.

"I need to do things, I can't sit still," he said. "My main interest in life is doing things others don't want to do – which is why I make magnets out of polyester now."

Born in 1928 in Montreal, Laurie moved in the 1930s to Ottawa, which at the time, was "famous for a lot of racial fighting," he said.

It was there that he learned the lesson to always "fight back" when it came to defending his ethnicity and religion.

"I can't tell you how many fights I had over my faith," he said.

At 16, Laurie joined the Canadian Navy as a photographer-gunner, though he saw no significant action, he said.

Afterward, with his skills as a cameraman, he found work with ABC News Pictures in Montreal, where he had a chance to meet and photograph many dignitaries and luminaries of the day.

When he thinks of Israel now, 60 years after his part was played in its formation, Laurie gets both nostalgic and upset.

"I cry for Israel. People don't know the truth about it. Every [country] has a reason for doing what they do," he said. "But the only country given hell for what they do is Israel. I believe strongly in Israel and if they'd let me, I'd pick up a rifle and go back."

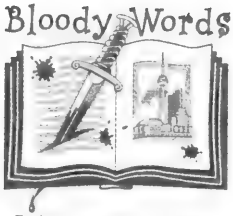
Mystery writers visit Toronto for a bloody good time



By BENJAMIN GLEISSER
Special to The CJN

People with murder on their minds are coming to Toronto. But don't worry – they only break the Sixth Commandment on paper.

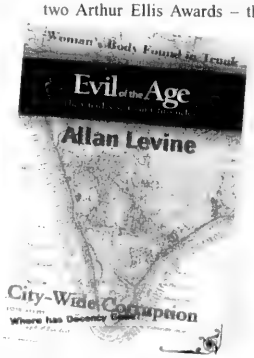
A slew of mystery and crime writers and several hundred of their fans will visit Toronto for Bloody Words VIII, to be held June 6 to 8 at the Eaton Centre Downtown Marriott Hotel. Bloody Words is Canada's oldest and largest convention of professional writers, amateur sleuths, librarians and readers who love things that bleed, bark, bang and go bump in the night. The whodunit summit features panels of authors debating the state of mayhem in literature today, as well as lectures by experts in the fields of criminology and forensics.

Fictional detectives are a diverse group, says conference organizer Cheryl Freedman, executive director of Crime Writers of Canada. Indeed, there are Jewish detectives, Muslim detectives, mothers, blind doctors, psychics, and even vampire detectives.

Author Barbara Fradkin muses that there are probably more Jewish detectives in mystery novels today than on most big-city police forces.

The Ottawa native has written six novels featuring inspector Michael Green, a no-nonsense cop who often forgets to pick up a challah for the family's Sabbath meal. Fradkin has won two Arthur Ellis Awards – the highest honour for a Canadian mystery writer – for her Michael Green novels Fifth Son (2005) and Honour Among Men (2007).

Allan Levine



"My guy is the only child of Holocaust survivors," says Fradkin, a child psychologist who now pursues her craft full time. "This influenced his childhood and shaped his vision of justice and power. His passion is hunting down people who are truly evil, and he sees himself as a voice for the powerless."

History also figures prominently in Allan Levine's mysteries. Levine, a Winnipeg native, set his trio of Sam Klein novels in turn-of-the-century Winnipeg, where immigrant Jews faced overwhelming discrimination.

In The Blood Libel (1997), Klein, a minder at a brothel, works to clear a rabbi who has been falsely accused of murder. The novel won the Margaret McWilliams Medal for best historical fiction. Klein sleuths again in Sins of the Suffragette (2000) and The Bolshevik's Revenge (2002). Evil of the Age, published in May 2008, is the first book in a series featuring New York City journalist Charles St. Clair.

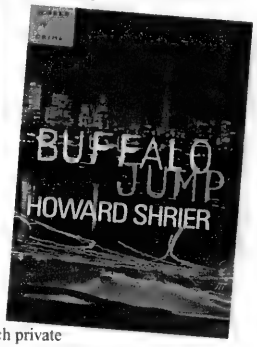
"Why did I choose a Jewish protagonist?" Levine, a history teacher at St. John's-Ravenscourt School says, "It's the old phrase: 'Write what you know.' I'm particularly attracted to the underdog experience, and I'm very familiar with stories of the Diaspora – they're filled with colourful characters and great plots."

Levine, who describes himself as a "historian first and fiction writer second," has also penned non-fiction tomes including Scattered Among the Peoples: The Jewish Diaspora in Ten Portraits (2002) and Fugitives of the Forest: The Heroic Story of Jewish Resistance & Survival During the Second World War (1998), which will be re-released this fall to coincide with the movie Defiance, about partisans in the forests of Belarus who saved 1,200 Jews.

Next year, Levine will publish Coming of Age, a history of Jewish life in Manitoba that was commissioned by the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada.

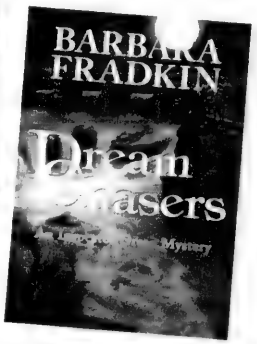
Howard Shrier

Toronto's Howard Shrier has been to several Bloody Words conventions in the past, but this year, he is attending as a published writer. The former corporate communications adviser just released Buffalo Jump, in which private eye Jonah Geller performs acts of tikkun olam while helping a hitman through a crisis of faith.



"My protagonist is a progressive Jew who's also a seeker – like me," Shrier says. "So there's a lot in the book about progressive Jewish culture."

Barbara Fradkin



In addition to author talks, Bloody Words will have seminars on topics including "CSI: Toronto," where Canadian police officers explain how they investigate crimes; "The Fraud Squad," about how scam artists work; "Deadly Doses," a discussion of poisons; and "World Enough and Crime," featuring the former head of Interpol.

Despite all the bloody talk, Bloody Words is one of Canada's most fun literary events, Freedman says.

"It's an intimate gathering, so people really have the chance to meet and talk with their favourite authors," she says, adding that people like reading crime novels because it's cathartic.

"Sure, we see terrible things in the newspaper, but mystery stories are different. It's satisfying to read about a crime being solved and justice prevailing. It's comforting to know that justice prevails somewhere."

Benmergui sought the 'real' Israel for TV series

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto broadcaster Ralph Benmergui sought out the "real" Israel for his five-part, first-person Vision TV series, which was timed to coincide with Israel's 60th anniversary celebrations.

"I wanted to show people the country, not the cartoon and the usual stereotypical representations," he said in an interview over lunch recently.

Ralph Benmergui: My Israel, which was also screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last month, covers a wide range of topics: Jerusalem; the security barrier; race and class; the influence of Orthodox Jews in Israeli society; and Israel's future.

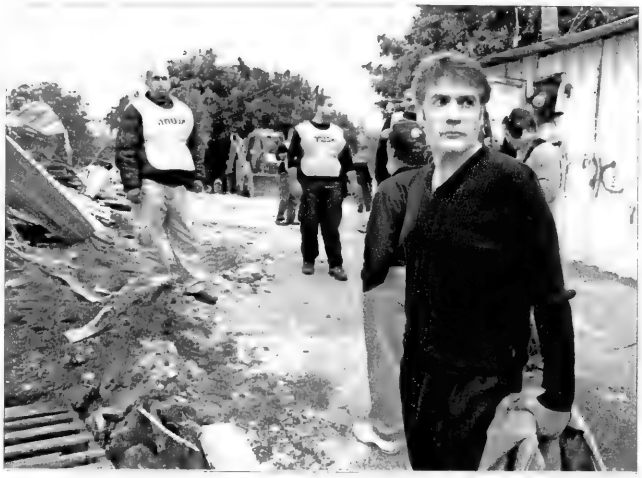
Benmergui, who had a 20-year career at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and now hosts the Benmergui in the Morning radio show on Jazz.FM 91, was not interested in regurgitating the media's "extreme version" of Israel in which Israeli Jews and Palestinians Arabs are in constant conflict over a tiny contested piece of land. In this hackneyed journalistic formula, he explained, what usually emerges is a "good guy/bad guy" portrayal of Israel with little or no nuance

Benmergui, who describes himself as a "liberal, egalitarian Jew," spent two weeks in Israel, mostly in the central corridor, gathering material. He was accompanied by, among others, executive producer Allan Novak and a cameraman.

Starting with the assumption that far too many Jewish visitors take the "Disney tour" of Israel, Benmergui was determined not to interview the usual array of politicians and experts, who would most likely bombard him with "spin" and thus divert him from a genuine understanding of a complex and evolving nation that is still very much a work of progress.

Instead, he talked to "real people," ranging from ordinary Israeli Jews and Arabs to Palestinians. Whenever possible, he interviewed them in their living rooms or on the streets they usually frequent. "Above and beyond, I was listening to them."

Philosophically, Benmergui approached Israel from a non-partisan point of view, being convinced that Canadian Jews are generally reluctant to criticize Israel when its policies warrant criticism.



Broadcaster Ralph Benmergui stands next to Israel's security barrier in Bethlehem

"We have to find a deeper way to understand Israel without axe grinding," he said, observing that such an understanding is of the utmost importance because Jews tend to be defined by Israel.

Proceeding from the assumption that Israel is a country pressed by enormous internal and external pressures, Benmergui believes that its serious social problems, from poverty to the widening gap between rich and poor, are trumped by security considerations.

Concerned that the Jewish state is being shaped by Orthodox Jews with a definite right-wing agenda, he said Israel should be more pluralistic and inclusive.

A Sephardi Jew born in Tangier, Morocco, 52 years ago, Benmergui argues that his fellow Sephardim are under-represented in positions of power despite recent signs of progress in this respect. "It's systemic discrimination," he claimed. "Israel is a European construct."

In his opinion, Israel's treatment of its substantial Arab minority leaves much to be desired. "Israeli Arabs should have better access to basic services," he noted.

Turning to the Palestinians, he said they should not be dehumanized.

He also wonders whether the Holocaust should be such a focal point of Israel's identity. "As a Sephardi Jew, the Holocaust does not resonate as much for me."

Benmergui's critique is a function of his devotion to Israel. "Israel matters to me. It's part and parcel of my existence."

As a youth, he idealized Israel. "It was a utopian dream with heroic Jews, a fairyland."

He first questioned Israel's direction during its 1982 invasion of Lebanon. The first Palestinian uprising – which brought Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip into sharper focus as a legitimate issue – clarified and crystallized his thinking.

He has visited Israel four times, the first time in 1990, shortly after Iraq invaded Kuwait.

Benmergui, whose family left Tangier in 1957, has visited Morocco once since then. "I got to see where my parents worked and found the woman who took care of my two older brothers."

His father, Mair, was an administrator in a Jewish hospital, while his mother, Rachel, was a nurse there.

They decided to leave Morocco following the rise of pan-Arab nationalism in the wake of Israel's creation, the advent of Moroccan independence, the Arabization of Moroccan society and the outbreak of the 1956 Suez war.

They chose Canada rather than Israel due to their perception that Moroccan Jews were not fully appreciated in Israel. "My mother said, 'Why would we go from a place where we were treated like dirt by Arabs to a place where we would be treated like dirt by Jews?'"

Culturally, his Moroccan Jewish heritage is very important to him. "It has defined me," said Benmergui, whose wife is of Polish Jewish origin.

Raised in a Jewish neighbourhood in Toronto, where he attended a local Jewish school, Benmergui was originally an actor and a standup comedian, performing for Mark Breslin's Yuk Yuk's comedy troupe.

At 27, he turned to journalism and entered Ryerson Polytechnical Institute. After he graduated, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation offered him a research job in Winnipeg.

Within eight months, he got his first big break as host of Nightlines, a late-night music show on CBC's stereo network. From there, he segued to a succession of gigs. He hosted Prime Time, a radio program, and then moved on to co-host CBC-TV's Midday, where he polished his interviewing skills. As well, he hosted Friday Night With Ralph Benmergui and Benmergui Live.

"I liked the CBC," said Benmergui, a contract employee who was never on staff. "I got to do the shows I believed in. I really believe in public broadcasting."

Before leaving the CBC, he produced a Christmas special for Stuart McLean and completed Seekers, a Vision television series about five people in search of spirituality. He says he joined Jazz.FM 91 because he had been at the CBC long enough.

The radio station hired him not as a jazz authority but as a broadcaster with a fine track record. "I know a lot more about jazz today than when I was hired," said Benmergui, who wakes up at 4:30 a.m. so that he can launch Benmergui in the Morning at 6 a.m.

A voracious reader who often discusses his favourite books on air, he hopes to compile a book based on Ralph Benmergui: My Israel.

"I'm talking to an agent about it," he said.

And much further in the future, he wants to go to the United States and write a spinoff, Ralph Benmergui: My America.

Three Israeli movies at Worldwide Short Film Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The 14th annual edition of the Worldwide Short Film Festival runs from June 10-15 this year. Among the 268 films from 31 countries are four on a Jewish theme, three from Israel and one from Canada.

Death of Shula, by Asaf Korman, will likely appeal to animal lovers.

Death of Shula* will appeal to animal lovers.

Shula, a shaggy dog, seems to be in poor health. His owner takes her to a vet, and the news is bad. Shula has a tumour in her intestines.

The vet is honest. Surgery will be expensive and risky. What to do? The owner, deeply attached to his beloved hound, wants to go ahead with the operation. His wife, however, is skeptical. What's the point?

Shula is euthanized and placed in a large cardboard box for burial. Neither the owner's son nor his daughter has the time to accompany him to a burial ground in Tedl Aviv.

Admittedly, his daughter sheds a tear or two for Shula, but no one but the owner really cares about Shula, which is sad because Shula has been around for so long.

Death of Shula is really about self-absorption to the point of callousness. Ther owner's wife and two grown children have lived with and known this family pet for many years, yet they forsake her on her final journey.

Korman captures these conflicting emotions in this somewhat touching documentary.

Home, by Alejandro Levy, is a strange film.

A young man is upset, understandably so, because her home is a toxic mess. The discoloured walls are full of pock marks, holes and mould.

Yet oddly enough, her disengaged and negligent parents seem resigned to the situation.

What does it all mean? Your guess is as good as mine. But perhaps the horrible condition of this family's home is a metaphor for a woman's quest for normalcy in a dysfunctional atmosphere.

Another Day, by Amit Turkenitz, unfolds in Tel Aviv as several cool young men are about to be called up for military service.

They work out their anxieties, jealousies and frustrations through the new girlfriend of one of the guys.

The film strings you along and leaves you with an empty feeling. It also seems pointless at times.

Song of Solomon, by Emmanuel Shirinian, is a gleefully subversive film.

Yossi, an Orthodox rabbi, is mildly reprimanded by a macher in his synagogue, told in no uncertain terms that his interpersonal skills are in dire need of improvement.

"You need to relax, to have some fun," a friend advises.

Yossi takes the advice to heart. Improbably, he visits a gay bar and dances to the beat of catchy music.

The macher is not amused by his escapade as the film cuts to Yossi praying fervently in the shul.

Asked to explain his bizarre behaviour, Yossi says, "Music and dance have long been expressions of joy in our faith."

The explantion has a kernel of truth to it, but how will Yossi atone for eating pork?

We're only human, aren't we? That appears to be the underlying message in this quirky film.

Photographer inspired by nature

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The work of award-winning photographer Sheila Reisman will be shown in an exhibition in Collingwood, Ont, this month.

The exhibit of 42 photographs, Heaven and Earth, can be viewed at the Blue Mountain Foundation for the Arts from June 7 to 26.

Reisman has had numerous group and solo exhibitions and her photographs are in private and corporate collections.

A former model and a world traveller, she moved to Canada 35 years ago and has residences in Toronto and Collingwood.

She has taken photographs in Africa, Europe, Mexico and the United States, as well as in Canada.

Reisman says that she is intrigued by how she is affected by the weather and the environment.

"When I observe a storm, a peaceful blue sky or a calm sea in relation to the sky, I am touched and motivated by the wonders of nature throughout the world.

"I decided that through my Heaven and Earth show, I would document how our home in Collingwood and our beautiful earth influences us. I have eagerly captured beautiful, magical and intriguing skies and ever-changing landscapes."

Reisman has printed her photographs for the Heaven and Earth show on canvas, in both black and white and colour.

Reisman is the winner of the 2008 Stratford Award and the Ryerson University Award for black and white photography.

She has had solo exhibitions at the Elevator and Sutton galleries in Toronto; the Hospital for Sick Children; and the Engel Gallery in New York. Her photographs can be found in the collections of Merchants Bank of New York; the School of Philosophy in London, England; and the state attorney's office in Tampa, Fla.

Reisman has donated photographs for many fundraisers and to charitable and arts organizations, including the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

She will be publishing a photo journal of her works in the near future.

For more information, call the Blue Mountain Foundation for the Arts, 705-445-7843, or Reisman, 705-445-3333, or e-mail sreis14128@aol.com.

Sisters Rosensweig opens at Harold Green Theatre

By RENA GODFREY
Special to The CJN

Three American Jewish sisters, originally from Brooklyn, N.Y., gather in London to celebrate the birthday of the oldest sister Sara (Rosemary Dunsmore). Sounds like a recipe for a disaster, but quite the opposite unfolds.

Under Jim Warren's insightful and skilful direction, Wendy Wasserstein's comedy, The Sisters Rosensweig, presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, will be staged June 7 to 21 at Toronto's Jane Mallett Theatre.

Wasserstein wrote The Sisters Rosensweig in 1993, against the tumultuous backdrop of the collapse of the Soviet Union. It is a rich play filled with articulate and humorous dialogue, yet there are serious undertones as most of the characters appear to be at a crossroads in their lives.

"The Sisters Rosensweig is very much about the characters' search for their identity," Warren says.

Warren is enthusiastic about the Toronto cast and refers to them as "smart, investigative actors who know how to uncover the layers."

The story unfolds over the course of a weekend in late August 1991, at Sara's home in Queen Anne's Gate, a posh residential area close to Buckingham Palace. Throughout the weekend, the sisters lovingly push and pull each other, discussing their own lives, loves and desires.

Sara is a "handsome" 54-year-old woman who is a high-powered banker, extremely intelligent and a double divorcée. She spends much of her energy on her 17-year-old daughter, Tess (Sara Farb), and is determined to control Tess' future, until Mervyn (Richard Greenblatt) a New York faux furrier and a potential love interest for Sara, enters the scene.

Pfeni (Sarah Dodd), Sara's youngest sister, is an accomplished journalist, who has chosen travel writing as her current vocation. She is laid-back, open to new experiences and grapples with relationship with her bisexual boyfriend, a renown stage director, Geoffrey (Steve Cumyn).

Gorgeous (Linda Kash), the middle sister, makes a comedic entrance, wearing a fake Chanel suit and too much makeup. She is a Massachusetts' wife of a "prominent attorney," mother of four, and a radio show host. At first glance, Gorgeous appears to be frivolous and somewhat obnoxious, but as the play progresses, it becomes evident that she is desperately trying to keep up appearances, as her life back home crumbles beneath her fake designer shoes.

With humour and wit, the characters continuously challenge each other and themselves. "The characters are extremely intelligent and well-read, and they use their humour as armour to deflect what is really going on," Warren says.

He loves the characters for their courage and ability to not give up. " It's not a sentimental play. These characters don't whine or wallow in self-pity. They may be stuck for a while, but they get on with it and move forward."

Although, the sisters' dead mother, Rita, is not present on stage, her presence is undeniable in their lives. Alongside this maternal strong-hold is the conflicting relationship that the sisters have with their Jewish roots.

Sara has gone to extremes to shed her Jewish identity, by moving to Queen Anne's Gate, where she tries hard to keep up a non-Jewish image and lifestyle. Pfeni travels around the globe, choosing to roam, rather than face her own reality, while Gorgeous tries to maintain the persona of the perfect Jewish woman from Massachusetts.

Despite the Jewish content of the play, audience members will be able to relate to the characters and their relationships, regardless of their cultural backgrounds, Warren says.

He attributes the universality of the play to Wasserstein's brilliantly crafted and detailed script. "This is a piece that seems on the surface very funny, clever and witty, yet on further investigation, you see how much depth is in all of these characters, and how truthful and potentially moving and real this story is."

The play is energetic and full of surprises. "You're constantly surprised by what you think these people are. Nothing is tied up in a bow. You're hopeful about a few relationships, but you really don't know what is going to happen in the end."

The Sisters Rosensweig is sure to have the audience thinking long after the curtain call.

The show previews from June 7, runs June 12 to 21, at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Performing Arts, Jane Mallett Theatre. For tickets, call 366-7723 www.hgjewishtheatre.com

Adam Sandler comedy messes with Israelis and Arabs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Adam Sandler's new film, You Don't Mess with the Zohan, will inevitably be compared to Sacha Baron Cohen's howler, Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan.

Like its uproarious predecessor, Sandler's movie, scheduled to open in Toronto on June 6, is a wild foray into a politically incorrect universe where nothing is sacred and everything is fodder for its dark, twisted humour.

In the mockumentary Borat, a zany, downright racist journalist from Central Asia, Cohen, is plopped down in the middle of United States and left to his own devices, with predictably crazy results.

Borrowing a page from Cohen's playbook, but hewing to a more traditional, scripted comedy, Sandler plays a legendary Israeli commando who is sick and tired of war and fakes his own death in a battle with his Arab nemesis so that he can fulfil a dream and become a hairstylist in New York City.

Like Borat, Zohan is a fish-out-of-water, comic-book character defined by deadpan behaviour and physicality. But unlike Borat, Zohan is something of a bionic man, an indestructible ninja steeped in the martial arts who's unfazed by onerous challenges.

At heart, Zohan is a pretty decent chap who likes the ladies – irrespective of their age, looks and physical attributes – and who desires nothing more than a quiet, uneventful life.

The film, directed by Dennis Dugan and written by Sandler, Judd Apatow and Robert Smigel, opens on a bright, sparkling summer day as Zohan relaxes on the Tel Aviv beachfront.

Judging by his juvenile but endearing antics, bikini-clad women just love this nice, but eccentric, Jewish boy. Before too long, a military helicopter lands and scoops up Zohan. Duty calls, much to his regret.

At headquarters, Zohan volunteers to take on the feared Phantom (John Turturro), an Arab fighter based in Beirut. Prior to embarking on his top-secret mission, Zohan joins his patriotic parents for a meal and admits that he has grown weary of the endless violence of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"I've done so much for the country," he says. "When does it end? When can I move on?"

Between mouthfuls of hummus, his mother urges him to remain in the army and "play it safe." When he reveals that his ambition is to cut and style hair, his surprised, dumbfounded parents assume that he's gay.

Dugan milks this mordant situation to the maximum and, later, he pokes fun at the non-culinary uses of hummus.

Having fought the Phantom in his hideout in Beirut, Zohan confronts him yet again and pretends to have been defeated in a watery duel.

Finding himself in Manhattan, where he goes by the name of Scrappy Coco, Zohan shops around for jobs and deflates pompous bullies.

Unable to land a position as a hairdresser, Zohan wanders into a shady "going out of business" electronics store. Here, in rollicking fashion, the film mercilessly skewers the bait-and-switch tactics of its Israeli sales staff.

At the suggestion of an Israeli who recognizes him and admires his exploits, Zohan is directed across the street to an Arab-owned hair salon. Dalia (Emmanuelle Chriqui), the Palestinian proprietor, gives him a chance, and Zohan is off and running.

Zohan's silky smooth cut-and-bang technique is a hit with the ladies, particularly the geriatric set. These ribald scenes are both amusing and overdrawn and seethe with crass sexuality. Sandler is kinetic, a whirling dervish of energy with his ersatz Hebrew accent.

The film unfolds to the beat of a Hebrew soundtrack, the first I have heard in a mainstream Hollywood movie. It also satirizes a Hezbollah phone line and Muslim bombmakers, and delivers a dig at actor and director Mel Gibson.

More often than not, Sandler's film elicits belly laughs, but it also dredges up tiresome jokes and offends cat lovers as it runs out of steam.

One skit, in particular, is in poor taste. "Who would write Arab go home," asks an Arab man as he reads nativist graffiti on a wall. "Ninety per cent of the world," counters an Israeli boor.

Strangely enough, however, the film promotes universal brotherhood within the context of American democracy.

Zohan, falling hard for Dalia, says, "I will only be stiff for you." Dalia appreciates his sentiments, but realistically realizes that a romance between an Israeli and a Palestinian is an unlikely possibility. Or is it?

Like Zohan, Dalia has settled in the United States to distance herself from the conflicts and hatreds of the Middle East. In this multicultural spirit, Israelis and Arabs unite, if only momentarily, to confront a group of white supremacists in the employ of a greedy developer who wants to tear down a charming neighbourhood.

You Don't Mess with the Zohan is notable for its moments of hilarity, and Sandler tries hard to please, but in the final analysis, it's a pale imitation of Borat.

Jewish acapella group wows Holy Blossom

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

The sound of a snare drum echoed through the Holy Blossom Temple, followed by a bass drum, a trombone and, in a tribute to Scotland, the distinct sound of bagpipes. Yet there were no instruments in sight. The music was coming from the performers' mouths.

Armed with nothing more than microphones, Six13 performed on May 25 to a crowd of more than 300. The New York-based Jewish a cappella group, made up of six young performers, transformed several Jewish hymns with their unique mixture of melodic harmonies and beatbox skills (a form of vocal percussion).

Six13 was the last performance in the temple's musical heritage series. The concert, a tribute to Israel's 60th birthday, opened with the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir, led by musical director Cantor Benjamin Maissner. When introducing the group, Maissner said that he had fallen in love with the "youngsters" as soon as he met them.

Dressed in identical black suit jackets, white dress shirts and blue jeans, the members of Six13 transfixed the audience with a mix of original songs and adaptations from their first two albums. While about 70 per cent of their concert was made up of originals, the group also performed songs such as Adon Olam.

Many of the group's original songs came from the member's personal reactions and experiences. Home, a song on their first CD, was born out of an interview the group saw on the news. A bus driver who had been through three suicide bombings told a reporter that he would continue driving the bus. When asked why, he simply said, "I have to, this is my home."

Son, a song from their second album, was dedicated to kidnapped soldiers.

"People take it for granted [that parents send their] kids off to war," said Alan Zeitlin, one of the members of the group. "Our hearts are with them."

While Six13's beatbox styles add a kick to their songs, the group's voices stand on their own. With their perfect mix of tenor, bass and baritone melodies, their signature song, Lecha Dodi, was so pure it gave me goose bumps.

Still, the best part of the concert was not the beatboxing or the melodies, it was the audience's reaction. In the midst of all the humming and applause, a single Israeli flag waved in the audience, keeping up with the beat.

While there were a few teenagers in the crowd, it was the adults who sang along to the music, swaying rhythmically like teens at a Coldplay concert.

Far from just singing, Six13 bonded with the crowd. The group's secret is its charisma. The laughter of the people in the audience rippled through the room when they were not applauding or humming along.

Each performer had a share of the spotlight – from Justin Rosenblum's reminder that he's completely single, (hint, hint) to Mike Boxer's beatbox tutorial.

It wasn't hard to find the performers after the concert, but it was nearly impossible to reach them. The second Six13 walked off the stage, swarms of people surrounded them and began shaking their hands, patting their backs and buying CD after CD. The only thing missing was an angry bodyguard.

Auschwitz survivor recalls St. Louis passenger

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In Auschwitz-Birkenau, Kapos were privileged prisoners given the power of life and death over the inmates under their control. Armed with a truncheon provided by their Nazi overlords, some were known to beat inmates to death for no particular reason at all.

Felix Opatowski had that in mind when he approached Kapo "Ziggy" to ask for reassignment to less rigorous work. He knew he was taking his life in his hands, but Kapo "Ziggy" – Opatowski doesn't know his last name – was not one of the brutal supervisors. In fact, Ziggy was quite helpful, directing Opatowski to another kapo who recruited him to the job he held for most of his two years in Birkenau, cleaning and maintaining the electric wires that surrounded the camp.

Felix Opatowski

Opatowski, 84, recalled that first encounter with Ziggy last week when he read The CJN's coverage of the Canadian government's program to commemorate the St. Louis, a passenger ship crammed with more than 900 Jews fleeing Nazi Germany. In 1939 the liner was turned away by Canada, the United States, Cuba and a number of Latin American countries.

Denied refuge in the months preceding the war, the ship returned to Europe where its passengers disembarked. About one-third are believed to have been killed. One of them was Ziggy, who Opatowski saw shot only feet away from him by a high-ranking Nazi officer after inmates sabotaged the gas chambers and crematoria at Birkenau on Oct. 7, 1944.

Opatowski is writing a book about his experiences and a movie is in the works, but last week he recounted his and Ziggy's role in the sabotage operation.

A native of Lodz, Opatowski was not yet 17 when he was arrested for smuggling food into the city's Jewish ghetto. Torn from his family, he was sent to Poznan for hard labour. "I was heartbroken to leave my mother, my father and my brother," he said. "That was the last I saw of them."

In the spring of 1943, after two years in Poznan, he was shipped to Auschwitz, where he would remain until the camp was evacuated in January 1945.

After a few months in quarantine, he was put to work "in a very bad place, a field full of broken airplanes" where he and others salvaged parts. Given no tools or gloves, he felt his strength slipping away and he realized he'd likely not survive the job.

That's when Opatowski decided to risk everything by approaching one of the kapos for help.

It was his first contact with Ziggy, but their paths would intersect often in the months ahead.

In the meantime, he was put to work maintaining the wires that were designed to keep prisoners. Many, at the end of their endurance, used the wires to commit suicide by throwing themselves on the high voltage lines. "When people committed suicide, it was our job to take them off. That happened every day," Opatowski recalled.

By chance, Opatowski came into contact with a Hungarian woman on the other side of the wire. She threw him a rock with a message scrawled on it. He learned she was inquiring after her husband.

Opatowski later returned the rock by hurling it back into the women's camp and his exploits in passing messages back and forth quickly came to the attention of the camp's Polish underground.

They recruited him as a messenger and smuggler to the I.G. Farben synthetic rubber factory (Buna Works) in Monowitz, also known as Auschwitz III. In the morning, he would join a work group marched to the factory under the supervision of Kapo Ziggy. It was that same group of prisoners who would return to the main camp at Birkenau with dynamite stolen by female labourers at Buna, he said.

A British prisoner of war, (Charles Coward), known as the "Count of Auschwitz," helped organize the smuggling operation and Opatowski is confident Ziggy was in on the plot.

The dynamite was smuggled through circuitous means to the sonderkommando prisoners who worked in Birkenau's four crematoria/gas chambers.

On Oct. 7, 1944 the prisoners attacked their SS guards and blew up the crematoria. Hundreds escaped but were quickly rounded up and killed. Opatowski, along with the two Polish underground members and many others were assembled at the SS headquarters and interrogated. One of the Poles died under torture and Opatowski said "I was lucky. I survived. Every time they tore [out] my fingernails, I fainted."

Ziggy wasn't so lucky. "A high officer" arrived on a motorcycle and "shot Ziggy practically in front of me."

It was at that time that one of the Polish prisoners told him Ziggy had been on the St. Louis, but it was only after the war that he learned the full story of the ill-fated liner.

Opatowski survived the torture and spent the next few months on a labour detail repairing the crematoria. In January 1945 he and thousands of other prisoners were force-marched out of Auschwitz ahead of advancing Soviet forces.

He was liberated in Ebensee, a satellite labour camp of Mauthausen in Austria.

While it is believed many St. Louis passengers survived the war, those who were sent to Auschwitz were generally not among them. According to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, "approximately 200 [St. Louis] passengers were deported from Belgium, France and the Netherlands to the Auschwitz and Sobibor killing centres in Poland, only four of whom are known to have survived."

Wolves' backup goalie eager to play in finals

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Robert Gherson wasn't expecting to see much action between the pipes during the Calder Cup championship against the Wilkes-Barre/Scranton Penguins, but the backup netminder for the Chicago Wolves was raring to go.

Playing behind American Hockey League (AHL) rookie-of-the-year candidate Andrej Pavelec, Gherson turned in a solid regular season, going 8-6 with a pair of shutouts and a 2.61 goals-against average along with a .914 save percentage. In 17 minutes spread over two playoff games, his save percentage dropped to .750.

Most importantly, however, he proved to himself and others that he can play at this level.

"I'm just trying to stay consistent and play well every chance I get," Gherson said a while back in his hometown during the AHL Western Conference finals against the Toronto Marlies. Chicago won the best-of-seven series in five games.

"Everything kind of fell into place here, and I got my chance. It's gone well this year."

After starting the season with the Elmira Jackals of the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL), the 24-year-old caught a break when the Wolves, the Atlanta Thrashers' AHL affiliate, came calling at the end of October. Chicago was in need of a backup goalie after Fred Brathwaite went to Russia and the six-foot-one, 175-pounder fit the bill.

Robert Gherson in the crease

"He came in and played outstanding for us," said Wolves coach John Anderson, the former Maple Leafs right winger. "We're lucky to have him. Certainly, he's impressed everybody here."

After four seasons in the OHL with the Sarnia Sting and Owen Sound Attack, Gherson was chosen by the Washington Capitals in the fifth round of the 2002 NHL entry draft. He was unsigned after attending two of their camps, but turned pro nevertheless, bouncing around the minor league circuit.

He made his professional debut with the Quad City Mallards of the United Hockey League in 2004, earning all-rookie honours in going 24-12-7 and posting a 2.25 goals-against average with three shutouts in 45 games.

That earned him a trip to the New York Rangers' training camp and a shot the following season with their AHL farm team in Hartford. He signed a tryout contract and again put up solid numbers, 20-11-2 with a 2.69 goals-against average in 35 games.

He joined the Columbia Inferno in the ECHL the following season.

Gherson had a disappointing 2006-07 campaign with Columbia, going 13-21-3, with a 3.80 goals-against average. He was invited to compete in last summer's World Jewish Cup in Israel – a tournament with teams from Canada, Israel, the United States and France – but declined for personal reasons.

Anderson made his international coaching debut at that competition, leading the United States to the gold medal in Metulla. Wolves owner Don Levin had asked him if he'd be interested, and Anderson jumped at the opportunity.

"We just had a fun time over there," Anderson recalled. "I rafted down the Jordan River, went to Jerusalem and the Old City, spent two days in Tel Aviv. It was great!"

Meanwhile, Gherson is hopeful that one day he will get to represent his country in Israel, perhaps even at the Maccabiah Games, an event his father Maurice participated in 35 years ago.

Maurice Gherson competed for Great Britain at the 1973 Games in cricket and was voted Maccabi Personality of the Year.

He had the honour of hitting the first ever six in a match (equivalent to a home run) in Israeli International cricket and vividly recalls the opening ceremonies at Ramat Gan Stadium in Tel Aviv.

Standing in the front, a few feet from a very emotional Israeli prime minister Golda Meir as she observed the Jewish youths from around the world, he remembers shouting, "Long live Golda."

The senior Gherson added: "She turned gently towards the British team, smiled, waved, raised her arms and shed a tear – a very moving moment, which will live with me forever."

Dr. J considers himself an ambassador for Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Basketball great Julius Erving, known as Dr. J. for his superb play in the 70s and 80s, told Israeli President Shimon Peres that he considers himself an ambassador for Israel.

Erving was in Israel last week, along with fellow NBA Hall of Famer Rick Barry, on a goodwill tour to raise awareness of the Migdal Ohr youth village for underprivileged children in northern Israel.

Erving called Israel an inspiration for Jews in America as well as other minorities. "I am truly inspired to be an ambassador for the country and for the village," he said.

Inside Back

I promise: no melting Nazis!

ALMOST FAMOUS
BY JACOB MEDJUCK

What was the first movie you ever saw?

I was four years old and we were living in Israel at the time. Movies were cheaper than babysitters, so my parents would leave me in movie theatres for hours on end. Let's save the negligence issues for another column and instead celebrate the irony that I am now a filmmaker myself.

You really are what you eat, and I was screen fed.

One of my parents glanced at an ad for a film called The Ark. It was easy to assume it was about Noah's Ark, and that a movie about animals and moral lessons regarding God's cataclysmic wrath would be good building blocks for any young boy. (I was four years old. I must remind you of that.)

And although wrath of God it had, Noah's Ark it was not. Rather, the ark in question was the Ark of the Covenant, and the movie was Raiders of the Lost Ark – that is, Indiana Jones, the first installment.

I was four years old when I saw the fingers of God burn holes in the torsos of Nazi soldiers and then watched their commanding officer's face melt off.

Fantastic. Thank you, Mom and Dad.

I ran out of the theatre screaming and into the front seat of Dad's Jerusalem jalopy.

"Did one of the animals scare you?" he asked. "God was fair and saved even the alligators."

"No Dad," I replied. "When the Nazi's face melted off, that's when I lost my hardened toddler nerve."

It's almost no surprise that I'm about to enter into arguments with the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) about the rating of my own film. The discussion will be about my "skewed" perspectives on what is and what is not appropriate for children to see.

I'd wager that I've come by my benevolent misjudgments naturally.

Raiders was a wild inauguration into the world of cinema. After that sensational movie about adventure in the ancient desert, I ran out to my father's sandy car, which was waiting for me in the ancient desert. It became my perspective thereafter that movies were about where you lived. It followed only fittingly that my first film would be about summer camp, where I'd done the rest of my living.

Now, almost three decades later, the saga of Indiana Jones comes to a climactic conclusion with the release of its fourth, and likely final, instalment, Indiana Jones and the Kingdom of The Crystal Skull. Its opening coincides with the eve of my nephew's third birthday. Will I shape the course of his life by way of this daring introduction? Or will I wait until the MPAA or his parents decide for him?

OK, I'll wait for his parents' permission. But wouldn't it be totally worth reading his CJN article in 30 years about how I scarred his youth. It's a family tradition, after all. It seems unfair to avoid the duty.

With this final Indiana Jones release, and my nephew's birthday, I feel the torch has finally been passed. Now it's my generation's turn to wreak visual havoc on your younglings, to leave them with memories of boundaries crossed, without corrupting their kindness or robbing them of their youth.

The festival warning on my current film mentions, "Just because this film features your children does not mean it is for your children."

So, babysitters beware. Parents, be forewarned. That is my notice to the painfully responsible. However, as my own parents once did, if you really prize your quiet time, send your children to see my stuff. And double your vacation afterward by seeing it yourselves, taking comfort that, warnings aside, rowdy audiences of all ages so far have thoroughly enjoyed themselves.

This is the best I can offer: to offend many and hurt no one.

Just to be safe, I should tell you that no one's face melts off in my camp movie.

See you on the circuit.

CARAMELIZED ONION & GORGONZOLA GRILLED PIZZA

- 6 tbsp olive oil, divided
- 1 c Gorgonzola cheese, crumbled
- 1/4 c chopped flat-leaf parsley
- 14-16 oz pizza dough, thawed if frozen
- 1/2 c walnuts, toasted, coarsely chopped
- 2 lg. onions, halved lengthwise, thinly sliced
- ½ tsp. salt
- ¼ tsp. pepper

Heat 1/4 c oil in skillet over medium-low heat; add onions, salt and pepper, stirring occasionally until golden, 15-20 mins. Transfer to small bowl and keep warm. Heat BBQ on low-med setting. Stretch dough into roughly 10"x12" rectangle on a large baking sheet; brush with 1 tbsp oil. Oil grill rack, then put dough, oiled side down, on grill and brush top with remaining oil. Grill, covered, until underside is golden brown, 1½- 3 min. Using tongs, return crust to baking sheet, turning crust over (grilled side up). Sprinkle evenly with onions, cheese, nuts, and parsley. Slide pizza from sheet onto grill and grill covered until underside is golden brown and cheese is partially melted, about 3 minutes. Transfer to a cutting board and cut into pieces.

Cardio vs. resistance training

FITNESS CORNER
BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Every year before summer, I get asked the question: which one, cardio or weight training, will help me lose weight faster for the summer?

The truth is that both help you burn calories and lose weight.

If you just do cardio training, such as running, walking, biking, aerobics etc., you are burning more calories than sitting on the couch. But the effect only lasts for the time you are working out and two hours after. Cardio training speeds your metabolic rate up, but if you haven't eaten, cardio forces your body to consume its own muscle mass for fast energy. The scale in your bathroom does move down relatively quickly, especially if you exercise consistently. But if you don't replace the muscle mass that cardio training eats away, you may be left with a different look than you expected.

Resistance training – using free weights, bands or your own body weight – burns just as many calories as cardio training, if not more, depending on your fitness level while working out, and continues to burn calories at that rate for the following 24 hours.

That is traditionally why to lose weight, you are usually urged to do cardio training every day, or resistance training three times a week and cardio training twice a week. Be aware, however, that the scale doesn't change as quickly when you are resistance training, because muscle is heavier than fat, but it definitely looks better.

As we age, our bodies lose the muscle mass we don't use, but, unfortunately, the older we get, the more important muscle mass is to our bodies' overall health.

Muscle mass increases your metabolic rate and causes your body to burn fat 24 hours a day. The best way to lose weight and keep it off is to do both cardio training and resistance training, not only to get the look you are after, but also for the total wellness of your body.

If you have never trained before, hire a personal trainer to teach you how, and be sure to check first with your doctor.

The bullied day school student

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

We send our children off to school and pray that the world is gentle to them. At the end of the day, our girl or boy comes home, excited at having discovered something special about himself or herself, or a bit beaten up by having spent a day as part of a group that has some members who can be harsh or unkind.

This is the third column in my series on flaws in the Toronto Jewish community. It's about a community member who, as a boy, studied in our private day school system and today, a number of years after his graduation, still feels a bit beaten up and traumatized by his experiences there.

Baruch (as we'll call him) never felt as though he was part of the "in" group of students – a group he described as "cool with a great sense of entitlement." He told me that from early on in his education, he was pegged as a "faggot, queer, homo," and this label put him on the fringe of his class and school.

"I never got physically beat up [at this point he sighed], but at one point, I counted the number of guys who would take turns embarrassing me and humiliating me. There were about 12 of them. They never let me forget what they thought of me and spread rumours around the class that were very hurtful." He felt ashamed.

According to Baruch, the hounding he incurred in the Jewish day schools was incessant and followed him throughout the system, and it left him feeling very angry.

"I have very bitter feelings toward those who bullied me. I really hated them," Baruch told me. "There was a guidance counsellor, but he didn't have the tools to deal with these problems, and besides, most of the bullying came from kids from the wealthier homes, the supporters of the school, and, therefore, they were rarely challenged."

The saddest aspect of Baruch's experiences is that they are not specific to him. I have spoken to many people, older and younger, who feel disenfranchised and suffer from low self-worth and self-esteem because of the insensitivity they were subjected to at a school, camp, shul or other institution in our community.

One woman I spoke to left the day school she attended as soon as she was given the option by her parents, because she felt alone, not able to afford the "hipper" clothing and shoes to keep up with the "Goldsteins." Another young man expressed to me how in public school he was voted "student of the year" because of his quirky, creative and embracing character. In the Jewish community, he had no friends.

Baruch says the Jews of Toronto need to know that many Jewish students are suffering in our Jewish day schools, and in the community in general, because they feel marginalized by the "in" group.

"There were many students who were so unhappy," Baruch said. "We all knew who was being picked on, and they were generally nice kids who didn't have the courage to stand up for themselves."

"I'm not unique in that respect. Kids like that came before me and afterward."

We need to hold our Jewish day schools to a higher standard of midot (behaviour), otherwise why should we send our children there at all?

Ask your child, or the students you teach, if they believe they have a voice in our schools and community and feel safe. Give them that chance so that the Toronto Jewish community becomes truly inclusive, and a warm and respectful home for all of our members.

Make your party a rocking affair

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

There's nothing like sharing your simchah with the likes of John Lennon, Keith Richards, Tina Turner and even Britney Spears. At the Hard Rock Cafe, guests are surrounded by original memorabilia, from Bob Dylan's Washburn six-string guitar to a jacket worn by Prince.

"Our memorabilia is very unique," said director of sales and marketing Marcelo DeOliveira. "We already have a theme built into the venue."

At the café, everything revolves around the entertainment. The café has an in-house audio-visual technician and the latest equipment.

In fact, the staff doesn't just host events, they plan them too.

"We are in contact on a regular basis to learn about the customer's needs," DeOliveira said.

The staff works with clients on everything from the menus and entertainment to the décor and linen selection.

"The attention to detail starts from the initial contact," DeOliveira said. "Other places have preset packages, but we try to make every event different. We have the freedom and flexibility to customize the evening."

Toronto's Hard Rock Cafe at the corner of Dundas and Yonge streets is one of more than 138 Hard Rock Cafes, hotels and casinos spanning 42 countries. The collection of more than 70,000 pieces of music history was started about 37 years ago with one guitar from Eric Clapton. After that, the guitars sailed in, followed by drums, scarves, harmonicas and hand-written lyrics.

- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

At the Toronto location, some of the most popular items on display include an original sketch drawn by John Lennon, a pair of Paul Stanley's black and white platform shoes, Bob Dylan's hand-made Mariachi suit and the guitar Rush's Alex Lifeson used on the Presto tour.

The café keeps up with the times with newer memorabilia from the latest stars. While The Beatles are well represented, so are artists such as Britney Spears.

In the last few years, the Hard Rock Cafe has become a popular venue for bar and bat mitzvahs.

"Most kids can relate to music," DeOliveira said. "We work with the leading DJs in the city. More attention is given to the entertainment than the menu because kids are involved in current [music trends]."

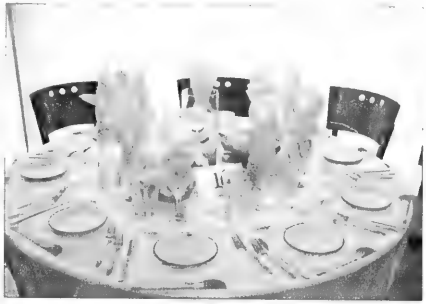
The Toronto location (416-362-3636 or online at www.hardrock.com/toronto) has two floors which can both be rented out. The main dining room holds up to 350 people (150 for a sit-down dinner) and the upstairs hall holds up to 300 standing (150 seated.) Together the café can seat up to 500 people for a standing reception. In-house security is also offered.

Customers work with staff to design the menu. While the venue's kitchen doesn't offer kosher meals, clients can hire their own caterer.

The Hard Rock Cafe also hosts corporate events and parties.

"It's a more relaxed environment for corporate events, as opposed to banquet halls," DeOliveira said. "Banquet halls offer no character. Our private lounge is above ground and has floor to ceiling windows. You get a great view of downtown."

Rock memorabilia hangs on the walls.



A popular venue for parties and corporate events.

Activity venues will help you plan your simchah

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

David Leese, of Loots fame (416-787-5668), can hardly contain his excitement when he talks about his latest entertainment venture.

He is about to launch Loots Factory Lounge (34 Futurity Gate) in Thornhill, Ont., a nightclub-style venue ideally suited to bar and bat mitzvah parties, sweet sixteens and corporate functions.

The lounge, which opens in September, is located near Dufferin and Steeles. "It's very accessible," Leese says. "It's just a short trip up the Allen [Expressway]. There's also lots of parking."

Loots is taking over a furniture factory and fashioning it into [a space reminiscent of] Andy Warhol's Factory Lounge in New York City, he explains. "You don't need to do decorating. We've built out the lounge in classic South Beach Art Deco style. We have beautiful leather couches. It's a place to relax and enjoy the night

"It's a very groovy, very cool, 'loungy' night club concept. It's a more upscale version of what we've done at the Loots Lounge, our venue at Bayview and Eglinton (1669 Bayview Ave.), but the Factory Lounge is still very affordable.

The new venue is 5,000 square feet and can hold up to 260 people seated for dinner, he says. "We offer an all-inclusive package."

The packages give you a choice of several catering services, including kosher ones, he says.

"We'll do centrepieces if people want. It's a one-stop shop We have a package for every budget."

Leese says he wants the hosts to feel like guests at their own party. "We produce the entire evening. We've made it very easy for mom and dad. You show up and enjoy the evening. We offer a party co-ordinator for each event. We do all the co-ordination of professional services – the DJ services, security, all the staffing. We'll also provide the prizes and giveaways."

He adds that guests will also have complete use of the games area, which includes Guitar Hero and Dance Revolution stations, as well as billiards.

Leese and his wife, Teri, first ventured into the party business in 1992, when they opened Loots (896 Eglinton Ave. W.), a party favour store. They diversified into entertainment for tweens and teens when they started Club Loots at the Eglinton location and later Loots Lounge on Bayview Avenue.

These venues are ideally suited to birthday parties and kids' bar and bat mitzvah parties, he explains.

"We offer great birthday party packages. We're now building on the tremendous success we've had at Loots Lounge on Bayview with our newest venue.

"We've always built in the concept of economy to offer our clients real value. We're bringing that concept of entertainment and value to the new Loots Factory Lounge."

For more information, visit the website at loots@rogers.com.

Another party venue revving up excitement for all age groups is the 401 Mini-Indy (416-614-6789), an indoor go-kart track located at 37A Stoffel Rd., near Dixon Road and Highway 401 (www.mini-indy.com).

Michelle McMullen, director of events, says the setting is ideally suited to all kinds of parties, from birthday parties and bar and bat mitzvahs to showers and corporate events. The 2,000-square-foot Racers Club Lounge has a viewing area of the go-kart track.

"We can comfortably seat 80 to 100 people for lunch or dinner. We have a caterer we've been using for 11 years, and he's fabulous. For special dietary needs, like kosher cuisine, people can use their own caterer. We provide the tables and linens and disposable dishes and utensils, but if people want to upgrade, we can get the rentals. We've also done ice sculptures, chocolate fountains – whatever's out there, we can bring in."

McMullen adds that for large corporate or private parties, the facility is closed to outsiders.

Great ideas for bar mitzvahs

The track is one-eighth of a mile long and there are different cars available, depending on the age of the driver: basically two types of cars – junior karts, and pro-karts for drivers 18 years or older or 16-year-olds with driver's licences.

Children from five to nine years old can ride with an adult in a double junior kart driven by the adult. "It has two steering wheels," McMullen says. "The kids love it."

To drive a junior kart on one's own, the child must be at least 10 and should be at least 54 inches tall, she says. "If you're not tall enough, you can't reach the gas or brake pedals."

The place is well-suited to birthday parties, McMullen says, noting that birthday packages for a minimum of six kids aged 10 to 15 start at $19.95. For that price, the children get two 15-lap races in junior karts as well as four arcade tokens.

"We have a huge arcade . We have 20 different video games – air hockey, basketball games, driving and shooting games. We have them all."

There are snack machines on the premises and the track will order pizza and pop for patrons.

People can bring their own birthday cakes, however, and as with the larger parties, special food arrangements can be made for kosher birthday parties, McMullen says.

For driving enthusiasts, she recommends the Go-Kart Sports Camp at Centennial Park at the Mini-Indy outdoor track in Etobicoke (416-898-6789).

She says go-karting is also a popular activity for corporations. "It's great for team building events."

There are various packages that offer good value for participants, she says, noting helmets and race suits are provided for adult drivers at no extra charge.

Junior drivers, aged 10 to 15, pay $10 for eight laps or $15 for 20 laps; with a $5 membership, it costs $20 for 20 laps for the pro-karts. "For a party of eight adults, there's a special – $35 for 60 laps. It's an awesome deal."

Another activity venue advertising in this supplement is Nascar, 416-669-7370.

Located off Highway 7 in Vaughan, Toscana is conveniently close to many restaurants and stores, as well as attractions such as Canada's Wonderland, Vaughan Mills Mall, Dave & Buster's, and movie theatres.

Guests will have a great time dining and dancing in the exquisite 8,000-square-foot Grand Ballroom, which can accommodate parties with up to 650 guests and is also attached to smaller rooms.

The elegant and spacious facility will keep guests well-entertained with its unique features, including drop-down screens and a one-of-a-kind surround sound system.

The delectable cuisine options from around the globe will keep people yearning for more. The award-winning chef and the French, white-glove catering service will impress guests as they savour Italian, Indian, Chinese, or kosher meals. A kosher kitchen is available.

The dessert table

To help ensure your event fits with your vision, Toscana has a dedicated team of experienced conference and social planning co-ordinators that can make your dreams a reality.

"Our team provides great service and is flexible and creative," said Judy Mahoney, Toscana's assistant vice-president of sales and marketing. "There are also set menus, but we can create and customize what the client is looking for."

As the festivities wind down at the end of the night, your guests can conveniently stay at the Hilton Garden Inn, which is linked to the banquet hall. This way, your guests don't have to hurry home and can share in your simchah even longer.

The hotel's 155 comfortable guest rooms include high speed Internet, a microwave, refrigerator, and coffee maker. The hotel also features a two-storey waterslide, a pool, a 24-hour fitness centre, and the Great North American Grill restaurant.

Complimentary parking and local calls are also available.

Toscana's services are competitively priced, and as part of the Hilton chain, there are also strict standards that its food and beverages must meet, Mahoney added.

Sole Power's entertainment is cutting edge

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

Sole Power is often looked upon by the industry as a leader.

There are many entertainment providers that promise to make your event the party of the century, but finding the perfect one can be tricky.

You want your function to have engaging music, vibrant special effects and an attractive setup that sets it apart from the parties you've attended and forgotten.

Sole Power Productions (www.solepowerproductions.com or call 416-663-7653) is Toronto's go-to entertainment outlet, and it will make your occasion the one to remember with its lively staff and up-to-date party features.

"Sole Power is often looked upon by peers and the industry as a leader in terms of new concepts and taking the standard out of the box," says Abby Tobias, founder of Sole Power Productions.

"I recognize that some competitors make similar claims about their services, but I think we're looked at by the entertainment industry as a team that's constantly pushing envelope as to what's the next product or service in entertainment."

Tobias, an MC, event planner, DJ, performer and producer, launched the entertainment group in 2003 when making the decision to form his own endeavour that would allow him to DJ, plan events and manage artists under the same roof. He's always been drawn to the entertainment world because it's continuously evolving and allows him to channel his creative energy.

"I like that this business is choreographed, but every night it's something different. It's not like working on Broadway and doing the same show and singing the same songs for eight months straight. Every show we produce is unique and they require the same entertainment value, but they're always different and fresh," he says. "Every event is unique to what the customer wants and I'm drawn to that."

With only five years in the industry, Sole Power's resumé is undoubtedly impressive and boasts events at the MuchMusic Awards, Toronto Fashion Week, The Grey Cup and the Toronto International Film Festival.

In addition to its reputation with A-listers, Sole Power caters to 300 Jewish events annually

"When it comes to Jewish events, we stay very entertainment focused," says Tobias.

One key requirement of an entertainment group is that its staff is energetic and charming, and gets bubbie and zaide dancing to the Macarena. Tobias takes great pride in his team of more than 100 people because they're friendly and approachable.

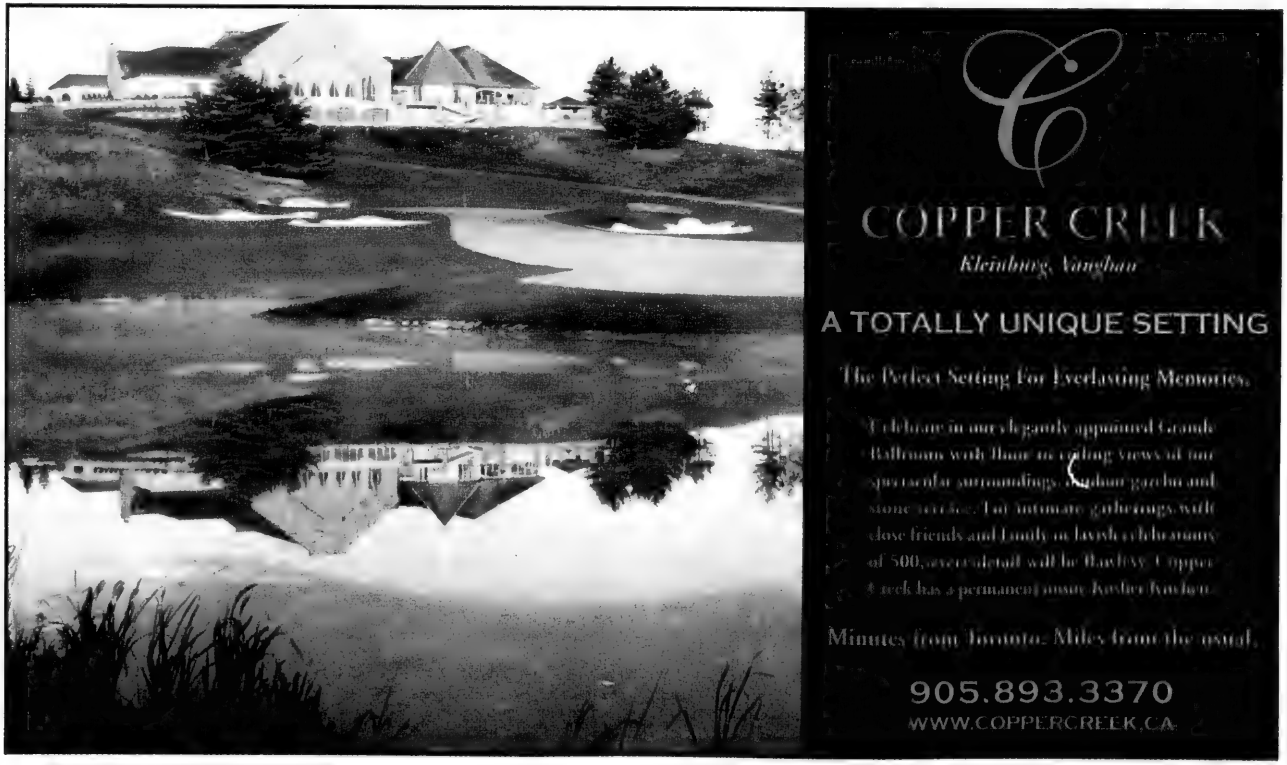
"A catch phrase I always use is 'Good people first, good performers second.' I can take a good performer and make them a great performer, but I can't make a decent person a great person," he says. "I always get compliments about how nice the people are on my team. They're easy to work with, friendly and genuine, and my first priority is hiring good people."

Your final decision to which entertainment group suits your needs best is based on how well its features lineup with your desires, and another impressive quality about Sole Power is that it's not pushy or aggressive with clients.

"All production companies do great work, and it's all about finding the company that best suits your personal taste. When clients shop around, they may hire my competitors and they'll do terrific work. In the end, it's all about my personal style meshing well with the client's philosophy and taste," says Tobias.

Sole Power caters to 300 Jewish events annually, in addition to top events.

"Everyone is doing creative things in this business. I've never been overly concerned with my competitors. I'm not aware of what they're offering or what their staff look like. We do our own thing and do it based on customer satisfaction and feedback, and take it from there."



A different kind of bar/bat mitzvah

By MICHELE ALPERIN
Special to The CJN

Some things never change. Or do they? Bar and bat mitzvah parties overwhelmingly follow a recipe that everyone assumes is written in stone, says Gail Greenberg, creator of mitzvahchic.com. The only room for creativity, people think, is to have a unique theme.

So why are people stuck? Greenberg attributes people's unwillingness to change to pressure — unspoken or not — from peers and parents.

"For the most part people are afraid of doing something different," she said. It's either fear that friends will think badly of them if they shirk their proper role or worry that grandparents don't want to be embarrassed in front of their friends by any crazy ideas.

And yet a few adventuresome families are breaking with the "chopped-liver sculpture party" and its accoutrements of loud music, DJ, dancers, candlelighting (invented by a caterer, by the way) and an array of desserts.

Sometimes families are pressed to try something different because a formal party does not make sense for their child.

Low-key alternatives

Walter Spiegel, whose wife, Sharon, planned their son Jeremy's bar mitzvah at his summer camp, said Jeremy was not particularly mature at 13 and had no interest in a formal party. But since the family loved to camp, the weekend with guests in cabins, the service in an outdoor chapel (until it rained) and a casual party with country line dancing and a hayride was very comfortable for him.

The biggest downside of the camp experience was the huge amount of planning required, as Jeremy's parents gave up the synagogue infrastructure.

But as has been reported by many families who try something a little different, the Spiegels' friends still tell them it was the best bar mitzvah they ever went to.

Others replace the typical bar mitzvah party with low-key alternatives, either a kiddush luncheon for the congregation or an informal meal at home, plus a separate kids' party tailored to what kids like to do – not necessarily dancing and party games.

Leslie Belay said that probably 90 per cent of families in her synagogue celebrate without the typical fanfare. She attributed their willingness to avoid a lavish party to her rabbi's stand for meaning and against ostentation.

After the renovation of the social hall, Rabbi Barbara Penzner of Temple Hillel B'nai Torah in West Roxbury, Mass., laid the groundwork for the lower-key celebrations typical at her synagogue. As Belay remembered it, Penzner suggested that celebrations maintain the ruach, or spirit, of the congregation – keeping down the expense and inviting fellow congregants to a party that takes place right after the service. As a result, observed Belay, "nobody is feeling pressured to spend up. The pressure is to celebrate authentically without being ostentatious."

Bar mitzvah party formula

In most places, though, the bar mitzvah party formula remains an immovable fortress, evolving little, and usually more focused on the hosts than on the guests, who are usually parked at big tables, making awkward chitchat with people they don't know.

Karen Echeverria, who admitted that the bat mitzvah she planned for her twin daughters was "out of the box to the expensive side," kept her guests' experience front and centre.

"Most successful parties," she said, "are where the guests have a great time, not the hosts."

Echeverria was determined to serve the mixed needs of her expected guests: elderly relatives who would not want to stay up too late; kids who needed to be entertained; Orthodox relatives who would have to come late to the June shindig; and friends who would prefer quiet conversation to loud music.

She used a model she had learned from cruise ships, where people criss-crossed a central lobby and visited surrounding rooms, each with a different flavour and interesting activities. She took over a Jewish country club and created four separate venues. One room had lots of couches and a jazz band; another held a casino with games and a magician; a third was set up as a nightclub room with platform seating; and the last offered virtual reality games that involved kids creating videos of themselves playing electronic sports.

In Greenberg's book Mitzvah Chic: How to Host a Meaningful, Fun, Drop-Dead Gorgeous Bar or Bat Mitzvah, she wrote that she would like to see more people throw out the formula and experiment fearlessly. For those worried about what their friends might think, Greenberg suggested that a little creativity can go a long way.

"I've always assumed, in my life," she said, "that you get a better reaction when you surprise people in a pleasant way."

Israeli Source offers affordable fine Judaica

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

Whether it's an elegant pair of candle holders for Shabbat, a sparkling set of Kiddush cups, or a mezuzah to adorn the entrance of your new home, Israeli Source strives to fulfil your every Judaica need.

Established in February 2006 by husband-and-wife team Chuck and Barbara Elnekave, Israeli Source offers high-quality Judaica at affordable prices.

With all of the challenges involved in maintaining a Jewish home, the Elnekaves sought to alleviate some of the pressure by providing good products without the financial burden.

The couple's passion for Jewish books and gifts, combined with invaluable experience in the Jewish wholesale and retail food markets, naturally evolved into Israeli Source, which they call "the ultimate Jewish shopping experience."

Israeli Source boasts 4,000-sq.-ft. of diverse Jewish products.

Located just north of Yonge Street and Steeles Avenue at 60 Doncaster Ave., the Thornhill store boasts 4,000 square feet of diverse Jewish products.

Chuck describes his business as "more of a self-serve store" and cites the personal shopping experience as a primary motivation for clients to keep coming back.

"Instead of having one of each item on display, you shop in our warehouse," Elnekave says.

This "active warehouse style" allows shoppers to access an enormous range of products made by Israeli artists and companies. It also dramatically cuts prices and provides an opportunity to purchase affordable, authentic Judaica.

But that's not to say that Israeli Source doesn't have knowledgeable staff. The couple describes their employees as top-notch, and they take measures to ensure they are qualified to contribute to the vision of the company.

"Anyone who wants to continue our cultural tradition needs a place to find Judaica," Chuck says of the importance of his products. "For the Jewish community, [the store] plays a very valuable role."

To the Elnekaves' own surprise, table cloths adorned with Jewish images have proven to be the store's most popular item. Stain resistant and esthetically appealing, they have been purchased primarily as housewarming gifts for newly engaged couples, and for personal use.

With the exception of English books and electronics, as well as a few other items, Israeli Source purchases the majority of its products directly from Israel.

During biannual sourcing trips to the Jewish state, the Elnekaves meet with suppliers and artists to personally select new and unique Judaica for their shelves.

As Israeli Source grows in popularity, their focus has been shifting increasingly more to hand-made, one-of-a-kind items.

Chuck says unique Jewish pieces sold at reasonable prices are in very high demand in the community. "We want to fulfil that need," he says.

The family business also provides toys and interactive products, ranging from the games Aleph Bet Bingo and Kosherland to paint-your-own dreidel sets.

Adults can browse for cookbooks and other Jewish literature for themselves, as well as for stories for their young children.

With its myriad of products, diversity of pieces, range of pricing and high-quality staff, Israeli Source truly is the source for Jewish living in Toronto.

Hanging out with teen boys

By JEANNETTE FRIEDMAN
Special to The CJN

Teenage boys have ways of hanging out, so, the best thing to do is be ready when they show up at your house in bunches, and set some ground rules.

Pizza boxes and other take-out packaging goes in the trash, soda cans and bottles get recycled, paper goods get dumped, and if dishes and glassware are involved, the kids have to wash up after themselves. After all, if they are old enough to make a mess, they are old enough to clean up after themselves, even if you are lucky enough to have your own housekeeper.

A word of advice: while teens think they are adults, their parties require adult supervision. You know there's trouble when things get too quiet, so ears and eyes need to be on the alert at all times, because sometimes teens are worse than toddlers.

Fun and games

For some reason, boys love movie marathons, so for a special occasion you can pile a group in the van and catch the flicks at a local movie house, where parties can be arranged. Your home is spared from wear and tear, and cleaning up becomes someone else's job.

But if that's not in your budget, be prepared for teen sprawl. Stock the family room with extra floor pillows, a huge TV set (if possible) and plenty of action DVDs to keep them busy, from dawn to dusk. There are a plethora of "film festivals" you can arrange: Star Wars, Star Trek, Die Hard, Sergio Leone spaghetti Westerns, Harry Potter or Mission Impossible, to name a few.

Pool parties require supervision

And, those mouths need to be fed. If you can, stay away from feeding them sugar, which will make them hyper. Ultimately, however, you may have to cave into a certain amount of junk food, such as popcorn or pop.

If the party isn't planned, be prepared for the spontaneous. You never know when your sons will come home with 15 kids after playing tackle football at the local schoolyard, or going ice skating at the rink. They will be looking for pizza or chicken fingers to order from local restaurants. If it's left up to you, entice the teens with soup and bowls of chips, or pretzels and crackers. If it's cold enough, leave the sodas on the back porch and let the great outdoors be your fridge.

Better yet, let the boys hang outdoors. There's a teen outdoor party for every season.

Summer pool parties are fun, but they do require adult supervision. The boys will be sure to create their own amusements, but you can add to the fun by providing toys for pool volleyball or basketball or any number of games. Your pool store should carry age-appropriate accessories.

In the fall, take your van or SUV, a portable grill and show the boys how to create a tailgate feast in your own backyard or driveway. Provide meat, buns and all the trimmings to fill their bellies. Keep an eye on their shenanigans and let them train to be the Food Network's next grilling geniuses. All the while, they can be watching the game on a portable TV, plugged into the vehicle's cigarette lighter. They can make believe they are at the stadium, and you have them under your watchful eye.

Winter is a snap. With snowfall, the sleds come out, as do the skis and skates. If you want to keep the kids on the premises, challenge them to build a real snow fort, have a real snowball fight, and build a fire in a safe pit, where they can toast their own marshmallows on twigs from trees in your yard. Keep an extra supply of hats, gloves and warm socks available in case of "emergency" losses. Have the hot cocoa and cookies ready when they come indoors to warm up, and follow up with a hearty, thick, winter soup.

Spring is baseball season, so taking the boys out to the ballgame is always a treat. Find out if the local team has a hat or glove day – there's always something geared to kids and teens – and you can co-ordinate your event accordingly. The traditional menu: roasted peanuts in their shells, caramel-coated popcorn, hot dogs and ice pops for dessert. Stadium too expensive? Set your boys up in front of a flatscreen TV and tell them to pretend it's a skybox.

Above all, be prepared when the boys show up. Whenever they bring over their friends, they will be hungry and eat whatever isn't nailed down. Stock every nosh you can think of in your pantry, from chips, nuts and sweets to healthy treats. Be sure to have lots on hand, because growing boys are like vacuum cleaners who will make a clean sweep of your kitchen pantry.

B'nai mitzvah projects embrace tikkun olam, express individuality

By ELLIE GROSSMAN
Special to The CJN

Anyone who thinks that teens today are lazy and self-centred hasn't met a typical 13-year-old in serious preparation for a bar or bat mitzvah.

After all, b'nai mitzvah students are expected to memorize their Torah portion, chant Hebrew prayers, and put up with their highly emotional mothers who have obsessed for a whole year over everything from the guest list to the dessert table. As if it's not enough responsibility to lead a Shabbat morning service, the prerequisite into Jewish adulthood also includes repairing the world in their spare time.

Eager to be role models

Actually, with a keen awareness of social justice and a myriad of skills and interests, today's young Jewish people are eager to be role models to their peers and really make a difference in their communities and world.

Dana Demsky, for example, of Congregation Shaare Emeth in St. Louis, combined her artistic abilities and love for animals to raise more than $1,000 to help a local animal rescue group called Wildlife Center of Missouri.

"I love to draw, and I knew I wanted to help animals in some way," said Dana, who sold stationery she made out of black-and-white sketches of an elephant, zebra, baby fox, panda and cougar. "I wanted the money to go to a local place like the Wildlife Center of Missouri, because they take in hurt animals, make them better, and release them back to their original home."

Clearly, congregations nationwide have witnessed a trend in tikkun olam projects that are as unique as the students themselves.

"I would encourage bar and bat mitzvah students to do a social action project that really means something special to them, because it makes their mitzvah more fun and worthwhile," said middle-school guitarist Ben Barzilai, who continues to use his passion for music to help kids with disabilities.

Even though his March 2007 bar mitzvah at Congregation Kol Ami, in White Plains, N.Y., has come and gone, Ben volunteers most Saturday afternoons at a non-profit music therapy program called Heartsong, at which playing percussion instruments allow non-verbal children to express themselves, improve their self-esteem and make new friendships.

To say the least, mitzvah projects that involve kids helping kids are a powerful experience, and it's hard to say who benefits the most, the giver or the receiver. Another example is Ethan Kempner, whose passion for magic provided more than entertainment to a Westchester County residential home for kids with special needs.

"Ethan actually taught the kids how to do magic and even gave them materials to do their own tricks," said Laura Kempner, who watched her son practise his illusions for several months until they were perfect. "When Ethan saw their smiles and faces light up, it was very rewarding to know that he made that impact on other children."

To put a smile on another child's face was the goal of Skylar Elis, whose candy jar mitzvah project raised more than $500 to pay for two surgeries that repaired the cleft lip and palate of a child in Russia and another patient in Central America. Through a global resource organization called Operation Smile, children with facial deformities are able to get free reconstructive operations that change their lives.

Ending hunger and poverty

"Even though I don't know these kids personally, I still feel good that I helped them," said Skylar, who filled recycled jars with colourful candies and sold them at different events at Temple Beth Torah, in Ventura, Calif.

"These children are just as deserving as the next person for plastic surgery, and to know that they got help from me makes me feel good," she said.

In the 10 years that Rabbi Lisa Hochberg-Miller has been a rabbi at the 380-family member Temple Beth Torah, she has noticed an evolution in mitzvah projects.

"Some of the most meaningful mitzvah projects are about helping people help themselves," she said.

For instance, temple member and equestrian Jeff Kadansky collected money for Heifer International, a non-profit organization whose goal is to help end world hunger and poverty through self-reliance and sustainability.

The money that Jeff raised, such as $120 for a sheep in Africa and $150 for a llama in Asia, helped poor villagers earn their own livelihoods and produce their own food.

"Most projects are local, but I find that with the Internet, kids will browse around until they find something they think they can do," Rabbi Hochberg-Miller said. "Plus, the national and international news influences some students, too."

In fact, Elisheva Hochberg-Miller, the rabbi's daughter, was one of many Jewish people who responded to victims of Hurricane Katrina, which happened around the time of her bat mitzvah.

"I wanted to specifically help the Jewish community in New Orleans, where people had to postpone their bar and bat mitzvahs until their temple was rebuilt. Besides, the families had to use their money to rebuild their own homes," she said.

Elisheva raised more than $4,000 through an adopt-a-b'nai-mitzvah-student program she found on the Internet. From Hurricane Katrina to the devastating southern California wildfires, natural disasters and other current world events represent opportunities for bar and bat mitzvah students to help rebuild lives, one person at a time.

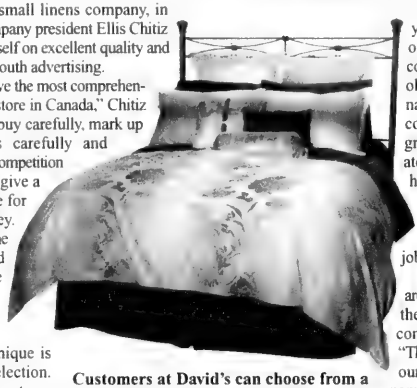
Registries make it easier to find the perfect gift

By RITA POLIAKOV
CJN Intern

From delicious food to head-bopping music, there's a lot to get excited over at a party. But nothing beats getting that perfect gift. In Toronto, it's never difficult to find a place to spend your money, but few registries offer good quality at reasonable prices.

At Deblins (416-782-2910, www.deblins.com), located at 39 Orfus Rd., 2575 Dundas St. W. and 7979 Weston Rd., you get just that. Deblins evolved from Debby's Linens, a small linens company, in 1977. Company president Ellis Chitiz prides himself on excellent quality and word-of-mouth advertising.

"We have the most comprehensive linen store in Canada," Chitiz said. "We buy carefully, mark up the prices carefully and check the competition so we can give a good value for your money. People come back and say, 'I love it.'"



Customers at David's can choose from a wide selection of quality products.

What makes Deblins unique is its wide selection. While the stores carry products made in the United States and Canada, Chitiz also buys high-end linens internationally from countries including Israel, Portugal, Turkey and China.

"We literally shop the world," he said. "The selection is good, it's stuff you can't get anywhere else. Most [companies] buy everything from China. We make sure we have a broad selection."

Deblins carries linen and related accessories for every part of the home, from imported towels and a large selection of high-end tablecloths to bathroom scales and bedside benches. Duvets, pillows and sheets are the most popular items for wedding registries, Chitiz said.

He chooses products with the best possible quality and value by attending various trade shows, and he emphasized the importance of knowing his customers.

"We cover the whole gamut for younger and older demographics," he said.

Chitiz said younger customers often pick vibrant coloured linens while older clients opt for natural hues. Of course, both demographics can appreciate excellent service, he says, and he hires employees based on their personality and passion for the job.

"Our salespeople are knowledgeable and they don't work on commission," he said. "The customers ask for our employees by name. They love our servers."

David's Fine Linens (416-590-7311, www.davidsfinelinens.com) is another store filled with quality products from the finest European companies.

The store at 2901 Bayview Village offers products from all over Europe. Owner David Saini personally chooses the products to import and sell.

Deblins has a wide selection of linens.

"I look at the history of the company," he said, adding that some lines have been around for 200 years. "[I also look at] their track record and whether they're known worldwide."

After 30 years in the business, Saini is a pro at picking the best quality linens.

"You know the quality by touching and feeling. You can feel the detail in the linen."

Opened 10 years ago, David's carries such brands as Frette, a high-end line used by Italian royalty and celebrities and St. Geneve, a line known for its luxury bedding.

At David's Fine Linens, customers can choose from a wide selection of bedding, sheets, towels and other quality products.

"We carry the finest linens in the country," Saini said.

Saini recently renovated the store to add 1,000 square feet.

"It's much better," he said. "There's more room so [customers] can shop comfortably."

To ensure quality service, he hires interior designers to help customers with their linen selections.

"We carry only high-end linens. Not everyone can put it together," he said.

The secret to the store's success, Saini said, is its selection.

"[Customers get] different products they can't find anywhere else," he said. "Other places carry stuff from China – 95 per cent of the products we have are from Europe."

Most importantly, customers come back for the quality, Saini said. "Our quality sets us apart."

Toronto is brimming with venues and banquet halls of all shapes and sizes, but nothing beats having your simchah in a real-life castle.

Every guest is made to feel like royalty at Toronto's 94-year-old castle, Casa Loma, (416-923-1171, www.casaloma.org), built in 1914 by Sir Henry Pellatt, a wealthy Canadian businessman and military officer. Under the architectural direction of E.J. Lennox, Pellatt took elements from Norman, Gothic and Romanesque architectural styles to create a castle complete with secret passages and spacious gardens. The project took three years and 300 men to complete and was only owned by Pellatt for 10 years before financial problems caused him to sell the estate.

CASA LOMA

- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity

"It's a real piece of history," said Lou Seiler, the director of marketing at Casa Loma.

In 1926, Casa Loma started hosting its first events.

"It wasn't used for wedding functions, but it became a hotel for 18 months," Seiler said. "It was well known as the place to big band dance."

Now, Casa Loma hosts weddings, corporate events and social parties, including bar and bat mitzvahs. The castle offers three main-floor rooms for events: the Great Hall, which has towering bay windows that overlook the five-acre large gardens, and boasts a 60-foot oak-beamed ceiling; the Library, which has a hand-crafted plaster ceiling; and the Conservatory, where the floor and side panels are made of different kinds of marble. Together, the rooms hold up to 1,200 people for a buffet dinner and 300 for a sit-down event.

Casa Loma is an especially popular venue for weddings, Seiler said. "With the quality of the interiors, the décor, the wood panelling and the upscale environment, it's the ultimate fairy tale wedding."

Casa Loma hosts one event per evening to ensure privacy and uses Liberty Entertainment as its exclusive caterer.

The Estates of Sunnybrook, (416-487-3841, www.estatesofsunnybrook.com,) offers another unique venue for any party. The estates, located at 2075 Bayview Ave., are made up of several houses teeming with history.

"Our location sets us apart," assistant managing director Lynn Foster said. "With 42 acres of land and the historic nature of the buildings, there's an ambiance you couldn't get from other [venues.]"

THE ESTATES OF SUNNYBROOK

The McLean House, a Georgian-style mansion, was built in 1928 for James Stanley McLean, the founder of Canada Packers. In 1966, the property was sold to the University of Toronto and was converted into a clinical facility by Sunnybrook Hospital. The house was later turned into a designer show house before being used for events. It currently holds up to 120 guests.

Ten years ago, the Vaughan Estate joined McLean House as an Estate of Sunnybrook. Built in 1931, the Elizabethan-style house was designed for John James Vaughan, then vice-president of the T. Eaton Company. After Vaughan's death, his house was sold to Sunnybrook and was restored in 1991. Guests can now use the Vaughan Estate's courtyard ballroom, which holds up to 175 people, and main ballroom, which holds 200 guests, along with the Estates' third venue, the Coach House, which can hold up to 60 people.

The Estates of Sunnybrook hosts weddings, social parties and corporate events.

"We're a full-service [venue]. We offer catering, beverages and staff," Foster said. "We've got experience [and can] make sure the event is successful. The staff takes a great deal of pride in where they work."

Some of the staff have been working at Sunnybrook for more than 10 years and all are committed to excellent service.

"You can ask any of the staff and get what you need. A waiter won't say, 'This is not my job,'" Foster said.

In addition to preparing for a very special event, clients are helping fuel scientific research when booking at the Estates of Sunnybrook. The venues are owned by the Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre and all profits go toward medical research.

Wine from around the world and gift baskets

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Two Toronto businesses, Mazel Wines and Baskets n' Stuf, can help you make sure that all the "loose ends" of your event are taken care of in a way that's 100 per cent kosher – and delicious.

Mazel Wines

☑ Kosher
☐ Non-Kosher

As an agent to the LCBO in business for nearly three decades, Mazel Wines (416-631-8071) can help arrange the finest kosher wines for any event. Clients actually purchase wine directly from the LCBO, explains Mazel's Annie Forman. Mazel simply helps you narrow down the choices, place the order, and then delivers the wine directly to your venue.

"We give complete service with integrity and honesty," says Forman. When clients come in, "we discuss the menu, how many people will attend." Then, "we go through with them the quantities of the liquor, and we can purchase it at the LCBO for them." And since most events require an LCBO Special Occasion Permit, Mazel can also help fill out and file the required paperwork to make sure everything goes smoothly.

Mazel can recommend choice of wine

"Our event co-ordinators sit down with the customer, find out their needs, figure out the logistics… we do everything for them."

Mazel's knowledgeable staff can also recommend specific wines to accompany any menu or theme. Many are of excellent calibre, and, although Israeli wines are popular, these days you can find kosher vintages from every corner of the globe, like Don Alfonso from Chile and Altoona Hills from Australia. Pricing is reasonable, too: both labels offer several varieties for under $10.

In fine wines, new listings include Goose Bay Sauvignon Blanc from New Zealand for around $18 and, from Baron Herzog – "the innovators in high-class kosher wine" – a new Cabernet Jeunesse for under $15. "There are a lot of kosher products listed at the LCBO," says Forman.

Before being listed as a kosher wine, all products must be cleared by the COR, so consumers are assured of meeting the highest kosher standards. And with today's range of offerings available through Mazel Wines, it's certainly no longer true that kosher means compromising taste or value.

When it comes to kosher gift baskets, treats and gifts, Nili Dzaldov of Baskets n' Stuf (416-250-9116) says hosts often realize at the last minute that they'd like to offer a gift to a special person or that they want to offer a unique basket to welcome their guests.

"It's a small store, but we have a lot of different things," Dzaldov says. "My idea was to open a nice, elegant, kosher store."

Baskets n' Stuf caters to almost every taste and budget, offering Maxwell Williams bone china; Fitz and Floyd products; one-of-a-kind hand-blown fusion glass plates and humorous Jewish-themed plates. For kids, there are even WebKinz stuffed animals, which are popular as favours.

Dzaldov handcrafts mosaic-framed mirrors in the store, each one unique. Some are available ready-made; others can be special-ordered. The mirrors can serve as a base for a gift basket, which then becomes a memento lasting years after the goodies are gone.

For any occasion, Dzaldov says a gift basket or platter is more special with a giftware item, such as a "salad" theme she prepared for one company, which included oil, vinegar and other related treats right in a salad bowl.

A wide range of nosh to chose from

Baskets n' Stuf will deliver welcome baskets to out-of-town guests' hotel rooms.

There's a wide range of nosh to choose from: candy, nuts, chocolate, dried or fresh fruit, or crackers with jam. Many hosts request a water bottle or an insulated lunch bag.

With enough notice, anything can be customized, such as one welcome basket for a Canada Day wedding, which was arranged on a Canada-flag tray and included other themed items, plus a flag.

Most edibles are prepared fresh on-site, including fresh fruit baskets; Passover "matzah munch"; and dried fruit baskets, all under COR. From Finesse Chocolates in Montreal comes a chocolate basket full of chocolates and a Rosh Hashanah chocolate cornucopia, which make delicious centrepieces.

In a high-tech world, Baskets n' Stuf is in the old-fashioned business of customer service: even the bows and ribbons are cut by hand. "We don't have a website," Dzaldov explains, because people love knowing they can just call or drop in at the store's Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue location. "They know they will get personal attention that way."

Celebrate your bar or bat mitzvah in Israel

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

Bar and bat mitzvah family trips to Israel are great for introducing your children to their Jewish heritage and the Israeli culture. Having your child's bar or bat mitzvah on Masada is an experience that will bring your family closer together while solidifying everyone's connection with Judaism and the Holy Land.

Rather than spending thousands of dollars on a one-night affair, splurge on a two-week getaway to Israel and forge memories that you and your children will remember for a lifetime.

Peerless Travel and Cruises, one of the largest Jewish travel agencies in North America, has flown thousands of families to Israel with its all-inclusive Israel Family Tours. President Ehud Telem says his team is one of the few to introduce their clients to new places and attractions in Israel, even if they've already visited. They also cover the key sites for newcomers.

"We visit an army base and kids can climb on the tanks. We do archeological digs, target shooting at a shooting range… and show the family the beautiful corners of Israel, the people, the size and the culture," he says. "We visit all the major sites and places that must be visited and because it's a family event, we try to do everything hands-on to make the kids happy. If the kids are happy, the family is happy."

Peerless Travel and Cruises recognizes that all its clients – adults and children – want to get the most out of their vacation. It promises that all its destinations will appeal to adults and entertain the kids. Each tour group is assigned a guide who specializes in working with families of all ages to guarantee everyone has fun.

In addition, Peerless Travel and Cruises makes it easy for you to customize your tour, whether it's by flying with Air Miles points, extending your stay in Jerusalem or switching your excursion dates.

Some families are turned off by the notion of travelling in a group, but Telem promises touring with other families will make everyone happy.
